JOHN WILBUR'S TESTIMONY OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

"And to strengthen the minds of any who may be wavering, we may well refer to the steady and unabating exercises and advices of the Yearly Meeting of London for upwards of one hundred and fifty years past—a body which has extended its concern and care over the whole society for its preservation in weakness, simplicity and purity of the Gospel, and which, in point of religious knowledge, Christian authority and weight of character, has never been exceeded in the Christian world since its establishment."

FRRIENDS are realizing as never before that their usefulness is greatly enhanced by a clear understanding of their history and message. The demand for modern books on these subjects is increasing. The two best brief works which have yet appeared are the following:

The Rise of the Quakers

By T. EDMUND HARVEY

This account of THE RISE OF THE QUAKERS gives the important facts about the early history of the Society in a clear and interesting style. It is accurate in detail and comprehensive in view. The interpretation of the early message is a happy selection of vital truths, well put. Every friend should have this little book.

A History of the Friends in America

By ALLEN C. and RICHARD H. THOMAS

This work, revised by Allen C. Thomas, sketches with skill the early settlements of Friends in America, their sufferings, growth, labors and migrations. The accounts of the separations are impartial, and the subsequent history of the different branches is given separately. An entirely new chapter on the "Latest Years" has been added, bringing the work up-to-date. Few histories have been written with more care, and few have more useful information, clearly stated in less space.

"A work which is likely for many days to be a standard text-book on the subject."—The London Friend.

"We have read it with interest. It gives evidence of much research and of a disposition to observe the impartiality of faithful historians."—THE FRIEND, Philadelphia.

LOSSES AND GAINS FOR 1906.

Our gathered statistics as printed below give the most encouraging showing which we have presented for many years. The total enrollment of the American yearly meetings has come up to 97,919, an apparent gain of 1,694 over last year, while a comparison of the gains and losses on this year's reports show a net increase of 1,639. 2,316 of the members reported in these totals are in foreign mission fields, so that the total number of Friends, of our branch, in America, exclusive of mission stations, is 95,603. We have received by request and letter 4,215 new members which is 858 more than we received last year by the same means. The total loss of members by disownment, discontinuance, resignation and letter amounts to 2,461, which is 437 better than last year.

The stream of "discontinuances" has, we are glad to note, run a little lower than last year, though it is still heavy. We have lost, to be exact, 1,146 persons from sheer lack of interest. The losses by letter are also heavy. There is much food for reflection in the fact that 559 persons have found it desirable to choose another denomination as their church home. It is an encouragement to see that our birth rate is gaining on the death rate. This year deaths exceed birth by only 23; last year the excess was 77.

New England Yearly Meeting had only 28 births as against 80 deaths, while Iowa had 133 births to offset 82 deaths. Indiana is still far ahead in numbers over any other yearly meeting, with a present membership of 20,283. Western, most of the members of which are also in the State of Indiana, comes next with a total of 15,229. This makes a group of over 35,000, most of whom live in this single State. We figure up a total of 1,352 ministers, which shows a gain of 72 over last year. On the whole, as we review the situation, there is distinct ground for thanking God and taking courage. There was a period when we seemed to have slowed down in our enthusiasm, and when it looked as though we could hardly do more than hold our own. It is cause for thankfulness that we have added over four thousand to our roll by application and that the balance of gain is so large.

KEEPING IN TOUCH WITH YOUNG MEMBERS.

The writer counts among the great privileges of his life, an intimate friendship and fellowship with two rare old men—Eli Jones and Pliny Earle Chase. During the period of this fellowship he himself was hardly more than a grown-up boy, while they were both well on toward the end of their lives. They had come up to the fulfillment of their rich lives along very different paths, and they were strangely unlike, but in one particular they were as much alike as two persons can well be. They were as young in spirit and in their interests as was the boy whom they honored with their love and fellowship. In fact, they grew old only in body, and were to the end of their lives contemporary with the generation behind them.

Like Portia's mercy, they were twice blessed. They were full of happiness themselves, and they made all the young people about them full of hope and happiness. They saw the world all the time through young eyes. Instead of concluding that the battles of truth were all won, and that, because they had fought well, they had the veteran's right to settle the attitude of those who came after them, they rather enjoyed watching the young army line up in its turn, and they entered with genuine sympathy into all the movements of the untrained and awkward squad, as though they were beginning life all over again. The result was that, without trying to do it, they led us wherever they would. While seeming to come to our level they were always taking us up to theirs. By sympathetically catching our spirit they were all the time unconsciously filling us with their own spirit. Just because they were so sincerely interested in the shaping of our own plans, they became, without knowing it, the models upon which we formed our ideals.

Those are the prime characteristics of a genuine leader. The little man tries to force his own views. He thinks he can guard the truth best by directing the minds of those about him into the narrow groove in which his own always travels. He knows of no safe way to go on unless he holds the reins. The real leader forgets himself, and never knows that he is leading. His supreme interest is in the persons about him. He loves them for their own sake; he wants them to realize themselves; he simply and genuinely shares himself with his young friends, leaving them free to be themselves. He exercises that kind of faith the good mother has in her child—he trusts the unformed character and believes in the dawning goodness of his young friends, and so he lavishly squanders himself upon them. The result is that such a man is able to turn over to those who will succeed him the gains of his life. What never could have been done by processes of compulsion, or by an attempt to force the truth, is done easily through contagion, and the attraction of love.

These two men are living on and are doing incomparably greater work than when they were confined to the narrow temples of their own bodies. They are working at a hundred centres and are pushing the skirts of darkness back because they had the happy secret of sharing their lives with the budding and immature lives which gathered about them. He who would guard the legacies of the Church may well go and do likewise.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

With a view to helping concerned Friends, we are planning to publish, during the year, a series of articles giving the general "Condition of Society" in our several yearly meetings. We are glad to begin this week with a survey of North Carolina, by Pres. Hobbs.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

BY L. L. HOBBS.

The scope of territory occupied by North Carolina Yearly Meeting stretches over the State from the sea to the mountains, and is now being extended into Virginia and into West Virginia. The mission known as the Blue Ridge Mission has been a part of the yearly meeting's field of work for nineteen years. Of the eight quarters constituting the yearly meeting Eastern and Contentnea are separated from other quarters so widely as to prevent easy communication with any other part of the yearly meeting. If we consider New Garden, or Guilford College, as the center, Eastern quarter is 210 miles distant and Contentnea 130, the distance between Eastern and Contentnea being about 80 miles. Western is, as the name indicates, west of the early settlements of Friends, and is the next settlement of Friends reached by one traveling westward from Eastern and Contentnea; and the territory embraced in this quarter is about forty miles southeast of Guilford College. Southern is south of Guilford College, from thirty to forty miles. Deep River is adjacent to New Garden Quarter and the scope of country occupied is mostly within Guilford County. Yadkin Valley is named from the fact that it lies along the Yadkin River. It is about fifty miles west of Guilford College. Surry quarter is sixty miles northwest of Guilford College, and is named from the County of Surry in which it is situated.

Eastern Quarter has long been a center of Friends. It is composed of two monthly meetings, Rich Square and Piney Woods, which are about fifty miles apart. The excellent high school known as Belvidere Academy was established at Belvidere in Perquimans County in 1835, and has been a center of light and strength to the entire quarterly meeting. As one may see, the monthly meeting of Rich Square is so remote from Piney Woods and the good school there, that the two meetings have stood much alone; and the entire quarter is so remote from Contentnea situated in Wayne County, that communication has not been easy and frequent. The members of this quarter as reported in 1905 were 393, and in 1906, 400.

The Friends in Wayne County constitute Contentnea Quarter, which is composed of four monthly meetings—Neuse, Woodland, Nahunta and Goldsboro, the last named having been set up in Eleventh month last. The setting up of Goldsboro Monthly Meeting indicates the progress going on in the quarter, and the tendency throughout the yearly meeting to establish monthly meetings in the cities and towns. As illustrating this statement we may note the monthly meetings of High Point, Greensboro, Mount Airy and Goldsboro. Contentnea reported 699 members in 1905, and 738 this year.

Western Quarter is composed of four monthly meetings—Spring, South Fork, Cane Creek and Center. The number of members reported in 1905 was 810, in 1906 it was 807.

Southern Quarter is composed of Holly Spring, Back Creek, Marlboro and Science Hill Monthly Meetings, and in 1905 reported 923 members, and in 1906, 889.

Deep River Quarter has three monthly meetings—Deep River, Springfield and High Point; and reported 745 members in 1905, and 777 this year.

New Garden has two monthly meetings—New Garden and Greensboro, and reported a membership in 1905 of 598, and 669 in 1906.

Yadkin Valley is composed of East Bend, Forbush, Deep Creek, Harmony Grove and Hunting Creek Monthly Meetings; and reported 1,138 members in 1905, and this year, 1,238.

Surry Quarter reported 804 members in 1905, and 893 this year. The monthly meetings are White Plains, Mount Airy, Westfield and Pine Hill.

In the meetings which have been established in the cities and towns the interest is more lively, and the various lines of Christian work, as First-day schools, home and foreign missions, temperance and peace, receive a good deal of attention and support. In these meetings one Friend, usually denominated a pastor, is mainly charged with the responsibility of preaching the gospel, although the way is open for visiting ministers with proper credentials, and the responsibility for the right conduct of the First-day meetings is shared by other ministers when present, and the local meeting on Ministry and Oversight exercises control as authorized by the discipline.

In most, if not in all, the meetings in the country, there is much the same custom prevailing as in earlier days. These meetings are often small as compared with the membership composing them, the preaching is less frequent, and the interest and active concern for the support of the Church as a means of promoting the solid religious life of the communities are less apparent and less effective.

We reported last year 62 ministers of the gospel, and 6,411 members.

In the case of several of the ministers, their work is confined to their home meetings; and some from age and infirmity are rendered less active than they would desire to be. The need is felt in many localities—one may say in all—of more members who will consecrate their lives to church work, and who in the sense of the call to the ministry will undertake the preparation in early life necessary to make the preaching of the gospel more effective among all classes of people.

North Carolina Friends have in recent years taken more interest in home and foreign missions, especially in the work in Cuba. We now have four members in Cuba, who have established two monthly meetings with a membership of fifty, and considerable funds are collected during the year for the support of foreign missions. It is true that the work within our own borders embraced in the report of the yearly meeting's Evangelistic and Church Extension Committee for the past two years has aroused more interest than ever before, and the organized effort made by this committee is very largely relied upon for the visitation of all the meetings with the view of arousing evangelistic interest and the maintenance of meetings for worship that will in some increasing way reach our young membership and gather to our fold those who are in need of sympathy and of the message of the Gospel of Christ. The method pursued is to gather the facts concerning the conditions and needs of the various meetings and communities, and then to meet these in the best way that it can be done with the means—workers and expenses—at the committee's command. In nearly every community the open door is found and the need is pressing; and in very many instances, if not in all, the same Scripture quotation that has gone the rounds in all the epistles is revived, "The fields are white unto the harvest, but the laborers are few." With adequate support of well trained and consecrated workers and means to meet expenses, thousands of members could be brought into North Carolina Yearly Meeting within a few years. These would be persons who would be useful members and capable of becoming centers of light in the various localities where they now live.

The Friends in our State have done much in an educational way; and yet not nearly so much as could have been done with more means. The school at New Garden, for fifty years known as New Garden Boarding School, and since 1888 as Guilford College, has stood for solid work and high aim throughout its history. In recent years its power has been greatly increased by additional endowment and by larger attendance. This institution has fostered the interests of the yearly meeting from the beginning; and to-day it is more vitally concerned, possibly, than ever before to be useful both to the young membership of the yearly meeting and to the larger interests of the church of which we are a branch. The work for the education of girls as well as of boys is appealing to us as never before. We believe the kind of work the college is doing is just such as is needed most in our denomination and in our State. This demand for instruction at Guilford is made plain by the fact that all our space for students is occupied, and we keenly feel the need of more. We have reported this year 2,263 members under twenty-one years of age. To educate these is a work large enough and important enough to justify the claim of Guilford College for support. As a matter of fact, a comparatively small proportion of these young people are educated at Guilford College; and many persons not Friends receive the instruction we are giving.

We are trying to solve the problem how to secure a larger attendance of our young members. The work of the Girls' Aid Committee which has extended over a period of sixteen years and has brought to the college more than five hundred girls, has had this end in view—so far as relates to girls—all the time. The building of a girls' dormitory for which funds are now being solicited is the outcome of the operations of this committee. There is the same need for a dormitory for young men; and such a building should be erected next summer along with one for girls. As the college is enabled more and more to fill its mission, its force in the yearly meeting will be greater. Its present usefulness in our State cannot be estimated, nor adequately stated. The permanent fund is now one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars; and the value of the plant, buildings, equipments and farm is believed to be one hundred thousand dollars.

The work which has for nineteen years been known as the Blue Ridge Mission, and which is situated in Patrick County, Virginia, has lost none of the interest which clustered around it in the early days when David E. Sampson labored so hard and faithfully to plant a mission in the Blue Ridge Mountains. The last two years have proved beyond a doubt that the efforts of Friends in that region deserve warm encouragement and support. The school in connection with the mission, conducted by Miles Reece, the superintendent, stands for everything good in the community, and is fast becoming a center of intelligence much needed in that section of Virginia.

The interest and systematic work in the First-day schools which are conducted throughout the yearly meeting are more apparent than ever before, and the fruit of former faithful laborers who have passed from works to reward is appearing in better teaching and better supervision. The same may be said of the work being done for the cause of temperance; although the needs in this department of Christian activity are so great that one feels the more keenly the little that is accomplished as compared with what ought to be done.

The committee of the yearly meeting to extend care to orphans find their hands full, and too little means with which to meet the wants that come to their knowledge.

Upon the whole, one may safely say the concern in the yearly meeting to meet the needs of our day as the early Friends met the needs of their day is on the increase. The method of doing this is less considered than the actual doing of it.

PRAYER FOR THE NEW YEAR.

[The following poem was written twenty-seven years ago by Augustus Taber, for many years clerk of New York Yearly Meeting. We have just received a copy of it in time for our New Year's issue. ED.]

Our Father, upon bended knee,
With reverent hearts, we worship Thee,
And humbly pray.
O let the mantle of Thy love,
And grace descending from above,
Be ours this day.

Forgive us, Lord, that we have turned
So often from Thy law, and yearned
For meaner joys.
And in this glorious world of Thine,
Have passed unseen its great design,
And played with toys.

Forgive our passion's fiery glow,
The hasty word, if not the blow,
Of patience small.
O let our thoughts still wait on Thee,
Who meekly on th' accursed tree,
Did'st die for all.

Forgive our pride, our foolish fears,
Our sad bemoanings, and the tears
That would not cease.
And grant our faith made strong and pure,
May all th' assaults of time endure,
And give us peace.

O bless the labor of our hands,
As we fulfill the day's demands,
With honest toil.
Give us each day our daily bread,
As children at thy table fed,
And wine and oil.

Be with the sick, O from on high,
Behold them with Thy pitying eye,
And hear their prayer.
O let thy love relieve the pain,
Their faith renew, their heart sustain,
With tenderest care.

And bless the aged and the young,
Bless all of every name and tongue,
Bless them, O Lord.
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done,
In every land beneath the sun,
With one accord.

And when the fading light of day
From all the world shall pass away Forevermore.
Receive us as with joy we come
To meet thee in our heavenly home
On yon bright shore.

And unto Father, and to Son,
And Holy Spirit, three in one,
Be praises given.
And let the glorious anthem rise
From all who dwell beneath the skies,
And all in Heaven.

THE PROGRESS OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE AMONG FRIENDS IN PHILADELPHIA.

BY JOSHUA L. BAILY.

In 1874 the reports on the use of spirituous liquors solicited consideration and discussion such as had not been accorded them in many previous years. This was at a session under date of Fourth month 23d. I have at hand notes made on the evening of that day giving the substance of the discussion which I will read, omitting only the names of the speakers.

At the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Fourth month 23d, 1874, Fifth-day afternoon.

The reports on the use of spirituous liquors were read and considered. The number reported as using or handing it to others was 54 as against 48 reported last year. The clerk asked if the subject should be recommended down to the care of the subordinate meetings as usual to which a few friends sitting near him responded affirmatively.

A Friend asked whether the meeting was not ready to take a further step by enquiring as to the use of fermented as well as spirituous liquors. Another Friend said he thought our testimony should extend not only against intoxicating drinks but against the use of tobacco. Another Friend, in proposing that the word intoxicating liquors should be substituted in the minute for the word spirituous liquors, said that it was well known that a large proportion of the drunkenness which we see around us comes from the use of liquors which are not spirituous, such as ale and beer, and the fact that the yearly meeting does not discourage the use of fermented liquors is accepted by some as a license for their use. So many as twelve or fifteen Friends expressed their concurrence in these views.

The Clerk attempted to stop this expression by stating that the subject would come up in a report from Burlington Quarterly Meeting. A Friend suggested that it would be better that the report from Burlington should be read before disposing of this matter by minute, and the same view was expressed by others.

The Clerk, meanwhile, was writing, and then rose and read a minute to the effect that after consideration the meeting had decided to recommend the subject to the attention of the quarterly meetings as heretofore.

One of the Friends who had already spoken said he had not understood that the yearly meeting had come to any such decision. Certainly a large proportion of those who had spoken had favored a change from what had been usual by now making the enquiry extend to the use of all intoxicating liquors, and that several Friends had asked that the report from Burlington Quarter should be read before any conclusion of this meeting was minuted.

The Clerk then rose with the minute of Burlington Quarterly Meeting in his hand, and stating that it contained a distinct proposition, proceeded, at once, to read it. It was a simple proposition that the word, "spirituous," in the fourth query, should be changed to the word, "intoxicating."

After a number of Friends in different parts of the house had expressed approval of the proposed change, some one near the Clerk's table suggested that "the meeting was not in a fit condition to act upon the matter;" another said "the way did not open." These two thoughts were quickly taken up by a dozen or more Friends, most of whom sat in the Ministers' galleries, and the Clerk very promptly made a minute that "after seriously considering the proposition from Burlington Quarter, way did not open to make change."

Soon after the reading of this minute the Clerk asked some one to name an hour of adjournment, when one of the previous speakers arose and said, "This, Friends, is the most sorrowful spectacle I have ever witnessed in this house. I should feel ashamed were I to be told outside what I have seen here to-day. Nearly every branch of the Christian Church has declared unequivocally against the use of all intoxicating drinks and yet we falter and hesitate. Can it be possible that this body representing the Society of Friends, in this place, and claiming to hold up a loftier standard of morality than any other Christian sect, can decline to bear a clear testimony on this subject? Why, even those whom we too often speak of as 'the people of the world' are in advance of us."

Several voices were heard in endorsement of these remarks, but near the clerks table a voice called for adjournment, and the clerk was about to pen, if, indeed, he had not already written, the closing minute, when the speaker already twice quoted, again arose, saying, "Well, then it is to go out from this house to-night that this yearly meeting has refused to discourage the use of intoxicating drinks, and this refusal will be accepted by many of our members as a license for their use, I ask you to pause for a moment and consider what sort of influence we can exercise as parents and guardians over our children and those under our care to restrain them from the use of these pernicious drinks when they can turn upon us and say, 'The yearly meeting does not discourage their use, the yearly meeting permits it.' Is this meeting willing to assume the responsibility thus involved? I entreat you, Friends, not to do it. I entreat you, even at this late hour, not to adjourn until some record is made, discouraging the use of all that intoxicates."

"Let such a minute be made," "I approve of that," and other concurrent expressions came from different parts of the house, and especially from the body of the meeting, and the Clerk began to write, but it was already dark, and there being no lights in the house, some one went out and returned with a lighted candle. "Let the Clerk make a minute and bring it in here to-morrow," said one. "No," came from several voices, "Let the minute be made now." "I am making a minute," responded the Clerk, and presently he arose and read a minute which closed with the words, "We would also recommend our members to avoid the use of all drinks which will intoxicate."

"I am satisfied with that," and "I am also," was heard from many voices. A Friend in the gallery proposed the insertion of the word "unnecessary," so as to read the "unnecessary use." Several objected to the insertion of this word as weakening the force of the admonition, but the Clerk responded "I have inserted the word unnecessary," and immediately read the minute of adjournment.

The full minute made on this occasion read as follows, viz:—

"From the reports from the quarterly meetings information is received that inquiry has been made of the members generally, respecting their use of spirituous liquors as a drink; from which it appears that the members of sixteen monthly meetings are clear of using them for this purpose. In other monthly meetings there are 54 members who use them, four habitually and most of the others only occasionally, of this number seven hand them to others. All the quarterly meetings but two in which there are those in this practice state that labor has been extended to such to induce them to abandon it. Although the number who use this pernicious article as a beverage is rather greater than that reported last year it is satisfactory to find that our members so generally discourage the practice. Impressed with the danger which attends those who make only an occasional use of the article of becoming so ensnared with the habit as to be unable to control it, we would affectionately exhort our members again to discontinue the practice altogether, and we would also recommend them to avoid unnecessary use of all drinks which will intoxicate."

LESSON II.

FIRST MONTH 13, 1907.

MAN MADE IN THE IMAGE OF GOD.

Genesis 1: 26—2: 3.

GOLDEN TEXT: God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him. Gen. 1: 27.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, First mo. 7.—Man made in the image of God. Gen. 1: 26—2: 3.

Third-day, First mo. 8.—Manner of creation. Gen. 2: 4-17.

Fourth-day, First mo. 9.—Names given. Gen. 2: 18-25.

Fifth-day, First mo. 10.—In Him we live. Acts 17: 22-29.

Sixth-day, First mo. 11.—Man's dominion. Psalm 8.

Seventh-day, First mo. 12.—God's wonderful works. Psalm 104.

First-day, First mo. 13.—The Christian's rest. Heb. 4: 1-11.

The last lesson closed with the "Sixth day of Creation," unfinished. The highest form of creation was left until the last. There had been a continuous rising in the scale. Even a cursory examination will show that there are two accounts of the creation of man. In Gen. 1: 26, 27, we have one—a simple statement of the fact of creation, and in Gen. 2: 7-24, a detailed account. It is not possible to make them exactly fit into each other, it is enough to say that they are not contradictory, and both teach the essential fact—that man had a Creator.

26. "Let us." Again the "plural of majesty." "In our image, after our likeness." The repetition is for the sake of emphasis, or it may be, "image" refers to outward resemblance, and "likeness" to immaterial resemblance, but that spiritual likeness is intended can hardly be doubted. What is meant by "image," or "likeness," and how is man like God? In the great variety which exists among mankind, it must be some common quality other than physical life, because physical life belongs to animals also. It must be something which animals, other than mankind, do not have. Perhaps the expression, "self-conscious reason," and all that it implies, comes as near to the truth as any. It is the exercise of this faculty that has enabled man to rise, not only in the material world, but in the intellectual and spiritual worlds as well. So far as we know, no animal, other than man, has, of itself, advanced a particle in intellectual or reasoning powers since the earliest times; no animal has used the acquisitions and discoveries of his ancestors as man has done; or has conceived moral ideas, and striven to attain them. It is these intellectual and spiritual powers, which make man akin, great as the separation is, to God, and enable man in some degree to understand Him. Probably the above is implied by, "Breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." Gen. 2: 7. "Dominion." Compare Ps. 8: 5-8. Amer. R. V.

27. The same idea as in v. 26 repeated for emphasis, and also the fact that males and females were created.

28. Like the rest of creation, God blesses man, though with a fuller blessing. "Replenish." Here the word means simply "to fill;" this is an old use of the word, which is now chiefly used in the sense of "refill." "Subdue it." Have complete control so far as possible of all the forces of nature.

29. Provision is made for the food of man, here only vegetable; reference is doubtless made to verse 11. Of course, the statement is very general, for the fruit of "every tree" is not wholesome for man. "Meat." Should be translated, as in Amer. R. V., "Food." So also in verse 30.

30. Provision made for animals. Here again the statement is a very general one, as nothing is said of carnivorous animals, insects, or of aquatic animals. Note also how it is said (v. 29), men are to have the seeds and fruit, while animals are to have the herbage. The fundamental idea is, that providing food for man and animals is part of the Divine order. "Life." Literally, "a living soul." The principle of life. "It was so." Note the dignity and simplicity of the narrative. It is, perhaps, the idea, that, at first, all animals of whatever kind were graminivorous, and it would seem to be the idea, also, in Isaiah 11: 6-9—a time when there shall be bloodlessness on the earth both for man and beast. All history and all geologic remains show the existence of carnivora, however. Compare Gen. 9: 2, 3, where man is permitted to have animal food. It is interesting to note that in classical tradition, man, in the Golden Age, subsisted on vegetable food.

31. "Very good." The verdict upon the whole work of creation. In the separate works, the verdict was "good;" here the intensive adjective is added. Again note the severe simplicity and restraint of the account and compare it with Ps. 104: 31, I Tim. 4: 4.. "And evening came and morning came, the sixth day." The six days seem to have a relationship to each other, thus: 1st day, Light; 4th day, the Luminaries; 2d day, Air and Waters; 5th day, Animals of Air and Water; 3d day, Land; 6th day, Land Animals.

Seventh day. The rest of God.

1. "And the heaven and the earth were finished." Heaven is here that which is above the earth. The idea is that the universe was completed. "All the host of them." Though this expression is sometimes used of the stars (Deut. 4: 19), and sometimes of the angels (I Kings 22: 19), here it undoubtedly means all the parts which make up the heaven and the earth.

2. "And on the seventh day, God finished his work which he had made." R. V. God brought His work to a close by not continuing on the seventh day. "Rested;" from the work of creation.

3. "And God blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it, because that in it he rested from all his work which God created and made." R. V. The need, spiritually, and, indeed, physically, for a day of rest from regular toil, has been demonstrated again, and again, particularly in highly civilized conditions of life.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath."

2. Rest is not idleness, or vacuity.

TOPIC FOR FIRST MONTH THIRTEENTH, 1907.

HOW GOD'S IMAGE IS PRESERVED IN US—OR LOST.

Gen. 1: 26; Col. 3: 1-10. (A temperance meeting.)

Second-day, First mo. 7.—Created anew. Eph. 4: 23-32.
Third-day, First mo. 8.—Like our Father. Heb. 1: 1-8.
Fourth-day, First mo. 9.—Manifesting God. John 17: 1-8.
Fifth-day, First mo. 10.—A marred image. Gen. 3: 8-19.
Sixth-day, First mo. 11.—A restored image. Luke 9: 28-36.
Seventh-day, First mo. 12.—We may bear it. 1 Cor. 15: 45-49.

Of all shapes of man or beast, bird, fish, or creature of fancy that men have formed to depict their gods, the one that seems to us the most nearly worthy is doubtless that which presents the human aspect. We have conceived no nobler form, yet we do not concern ourselves with the question of the appearance of God, but of His character: our calling is not to know and attain His stature and form, but to learn His mind and conform our purposes to His.

Man began in that harmony, which sin marred; and in marring it the image was defaced. And so inwrought our spirit and flesh that the stamp of sin, almost without fail, rests visibly on the face of the sinner. No law of God can be broken with impunity, and His judgments begin with the commission of the wrong, for His love is too great to allow the road of danger to be without its warnings.

One of the monstrosities of sin is that the season in which the birth of our Lord is commemorated should be to so many a time of special yielding to appetite, of indulgence in excesses which not only destroy the spiritual likeness, but mar the outward aspect of nobility which is one of God's good gifts to us. I had occasion to be on the streets on the early dawn of the Christmas Sabbath, and the first person I met was a man trudging homeward, mud-stained as to clothing, and unsteady of step; and he doubtless was but one of scores who had staggered up this and other streets since the closing of the saloons of Washington that night,—men who were "celebrating," "keeping Christmas," as they would say,—yet how far from its message of recall to the Father's house and of renewal in His image and likeness!

People speak lightly of the efforts to express statistically the magnitude of the drink evil, and say that it is impossible to state that 60,000 or 100,000 dying drunkards are its annual harvest. A minister was once told that twenty years' work of a certain church had, so far as known, resulted in the conversion of but one man, and was asked whether it was worth while to maintain a church for such returns. "If it was my son, yes," was the reply. What matters the absolute number of wrecked lives last year? Was there any good springing from the year's work of the saloons of Washington sufficient to compensate for the heartsick watching of the wife or mother through all the long hours of the night for that one straggling home-comer, or the shame and dread of brothers or sisters or children,—or the despondency and sullen remorse of the victim himself as the false stimulus of the poison died out of brain and nerve and the violated body cried out in revenge? And if that man were father or husband, brother or son to one of us or our dear ones, we would say, "No."

If we could only see the closeness of our relationship to God,—that our intended likeness to Him must make us unfit for the things that He has no pleasure in, so that we, too, can find no real pleasure in them,—would not our restless handling and tasting of forbidden and unclean things find an end in a glad consent to 'do ever the things that please Him,' so that we might be perfected in His image?

All the men and women who have made their mark in this world and have achieved the best results have kept the eye clear and single toward one noble purpose.—Theodore L. Cuyler.

Love is the greatest thing that God can give us, for Himself is love; and it is the greatest thing we can give to God, for it will also give ourselves and carry with it all that is ours.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE REBUILDING OF PICKERING COLLEGE.

It will have been twelve months next New Year's day since the destruction by fire of the principal building of Pickering College. As no temporary quarters were obtainable the work of the College has ever since been unavoidably suspended. This disaster, which overtook Canada Yearly Meeting's Educational Institution in the most prosperous period of its history, was a severe blow to Canadian Friends and the Society at large. Under its first shock, the prospect that it could soon be re-opened was most discouraging, owing to the smallness of the number of members in the yearly meeting who were able to render substantial aid. Nevertheless, a canvass for building funds was promptly undertaken in Canada, in which former students of the College took an active part. Much encouragement was derived from and formerly Provincial Minister of Education, wrote: "For more than fifteen years this college has played a very worthy part in educating young men and women for the University and learned professions, and for the wider activities of commerce, industry and home. Its recent destruction by fire was a severe blow to secondary education of the private and residential type in this province."

The Toronto Globe, the leading daily in Ontario, said in an editorial: "For some years past it has been, under the management of Principal Firth, steadily advancing in reputation. The curriculum was brought and kept up-to-date, and the teaching staff was maintained in a high state of efficiency."

A further exponent of the high estimation in which Pickering College was held by the general public was furnished by overtures received soon after the fire from a number of towns, soliciting the relocation of the college within or near their respective limits. In one such instance the application was accompanied by tributes to the standing and work of the school, which were received from non-Quaker sources. These emphasize the fact that the permanent closing of Pickering College after years of successful operation would be a serious loss, not only to the Society of Friends, but to the cause of education generally. For illustration, William Houston, M. A., a member of the Senate of Toronto University, wrote as follows:

"There is not a secondary educational institution in this province of excellent High Schools which has been doing, on the whole, more successful work on the secondary standard as tested by the University Matriculation and the examination prescribed for teachers' certificates.

Quite as interesting to me, however, was the co-educational feature in its residential life. Only in one other college has this experiment been tried and there it has for several years been abandoned. I think it a great public loss to have so unique a college even suspended; to have it entirely discontinued would be a calamity."

the offer of a cash bonus sufficient to cover the value of the former site of the college at Pickering, and a grant of free water and electric light for a period of ten years. Special weight is attached to this proposal from the fact that it came from a town which is located in the center of the largest early settlement of Friends in Canada, and has within it a prosperous Friends' meeting at the present time. In view of the foregoing facts the question of the future location of the college was referred by the yearly meeting to its representative meeting, with full power to act.

But helpful as were the many expressions of sympathy which were received from nearer home, still stronger encouragement came from Friends in England. Henry Stanley Newman, editor of The Friend, London, wrote: "The College, after all, is at the very kernel of the future of Canada Yearly Meeting, and Friends cannot afford to do without it." London Yearly Meeting made the following generous minute without solicitation from Canadian Friends: "In view of the deep sympathy which is felt by this meeting for our Friends in Canada on account of the destruction of Pickering College by fire, we ask the meeting for sufferings to open a fund to assist in replacing the college, and to appeal to our quarterly meetings with this object. We also authorize Howard Nicholson and Albert J. Crosfield to receive promises of contributions towards the fund." Through their kind response to this appeal English Friends have pledged 1,000 pounds toward the building fund. Generous assistance has also been subscribed by a few individuals in the United States.

The College Committee have had plans prepared with the hope that a sufficient sum may be available to warrant them in entering upon the work of rebuilding at an early day. They are most desirous, if possible, to reconstruct the College with such enlarged capacity for students and increased facilities for instruction as shall adequately provide for the growth which it may reasonably expect to make in the near future after reopening its doors. At the same time it is their wish to maintain as nearly as practicable the former moderate rate of fees and the special reduction to Friends' children.

During the last three years of its occupancy the former building was much overcrowded, and worthy students were from time to time denied admission for want of room. The proposed new building, shown in the accompanying cut, has been carefully designed, and an earnest effort has been made to provide for a substantial modern structure for college residence and instruction, upon as simple and inexpensive plan as possible, consistent with the comfort and health of the students, together with the necessary range and efficiency of educational work.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

The background of the New Testament is the Roman world, and a brief century with which we western readers are acquainted, but the background of the Old is the ancient east—the age and land of wonder, mystery and intuition, far removed from the logical, rushing world in which we live. The Old Testament contains a vast and complex literature filled with the thoughts and figures, and cast in the quaint language of the Semitic past. Between us and that past there lie not merely long centuries, but the wide gulf that is fixed between the East and the West. The chasm is really being bridged rather than broadened. From the ancient monuments have arisen, as from the dead, an army of contemporaneous witnesses, sometimes confirming, sometimes correcting, but at all times marvelously supplementing the Biblical data. Now the events and characters of the Old Testament history no longer stand alone in mysterious isolation, but we can study in detail their setting and significance. At every point the Biblical narrative and thought are brought into touch with real life and history. The biographies and policies, for example, of Sennacherib and Cyrus are almost as well known as those of Napoleon and Washington.

The prophets are not merely voices, because they primarily dealt with the conditions and needs of their own day.

Modern research in the fields of Semitic philology and syntax, and the discovery of older texts and versions have put into the hands of translators new and valuable tools for making clear to all the thoughts in the minds of the original writers of the Old Testament. Studies in comparative religion, geography and modern Oriental life and customs have illuminated and illustrated at every point the pages of the ancient writings.—Prof. Chas. Foster Kent, of Yale.

Correspondence.

EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I wish to speak of the Chapman Meeting in Des Moines, Iowa. One of the greatest religious campaigns that Des Moines ever knew came to a close Second-day evening, Twelfth month 17th. These meetings after weeks of careful preparation and prayer began First-day, Twelfth month 2d, and with a constant flow of gospel truth in speech and song, with almost constant service for sixteen days, the meetings closed with a good-cheer service on Second-day evening. The city was divided into ten districts, and able Evangelists with strong singers took charge of the work, hence at ten different points, services were held at the same time each evening, and thousands were permitted to hear the old story of redeeming love through Jesus Christ the only Saviour of men.

The tone of the work during the whole campaign was of the highest order. The Bible was magnified as the word of God to men, that sin separates from God, and that the new birth is essential to Christian life. The Church to be loved as the bride of Christ, and the agency through which the message of salvation is to be carried to a lost world.

Not a little emphasis was laid upon the relation of Church and the ministry, stimulating a larger appreciation for the pastor and his work, urging the fact that the pastor cannot do all the work.

Emphasis was laid upon the fact that card signing was not salvation, but that to accept Christ as the only Saviour of men, and the cards were held as a matter of record.

Some of the special meetings held are worthy of special note. The work among the young people was owned of God, and many of the young were led to accept Christ through earnest work of Dr. Schaeffer and his singer, Prof. Collision.

One very touching incident (among many others) occurred in the police court one morning after twenty-five appeared before the judge and over twenty pleaded guilty and sentence was pronounced, Evangelist Asher stepped forward and asked Judge Mathias to remit sentence, and he responded quickly, and forgave them, Mr. Asher asked how many wanted to live for Christ, and most of them gave expression in a favorable manner.

Third-day, the 11th, was Church day, when pastors and people met in their own churches for special services in the forenoon, then the members going out in the afternoon to visit delinquent members, those who had signed cards, and the sick. It was most interesting to hear the report from this work.

The meeting for aged people on Sixth-day afternoon of the last week is looked upon by some as the crowning service of the campaign.

The great auditorium was packed and overflow services were held in the Y. M. C. A. Hall.

Dr. Ostrom had charge of this meeting, and gave a comforting sermon to the old people.

There was one woman, a Friend, "Mother" Morris, present who was over one hundred years old.

To think of several hundred of the aged and infirm getting out on a cold winter day spoke much for Des Moines.

Another meeting, long to be remembered, was a short service conducted by Dr. Ostrom for ministers in the Y. M. C. A. Chapel, where the earnest longing for souls found vocal expression in prayer, and longing desires for the spirit of revival over the State. The spirit of the work in the Capitol City had spread out over the State, and many ministers came in for Conference day.

It is a little soon to speak of permanent results, but certainly Des Moines has been stirred as never before, and hundreds have claimed to accept Christ, and many backslidden in heart have caught a fresh vision of Christ, and their personal responsibility.

Des Moines surely feels that Dr. Wilber Chapman and his associates have endeared themselves to the people of the Capitol City.

David T. Prichard, who has been living in Topeka, Kas., during the past year, writes: "It seems impossible to establish a meeting here, owing to the scattered condition of our people."

An effort to secure an endowment for the Lebanon Hospital for the insane is now being made by the American Committee. Thomas Scattergood and The Provident Life and Trust Co., are the trustees of the fund, and Asa S. Wing, Philadelphia, is the treasurer.

Mary Sibbit, a minister of Kansas Yearly Meeting, and a W. C. T. U. lecturer delivered a temperance address at the Friends' meeting house, Noblesville, Ind. the 16th ult. A correspondent says, "We think we never heard a more interesting speaker on the subject of intemperance."

A revival meeting began at the Friend's meeting, Noblesville, Ind., the 2d ult., closed the 13th—twenty-one sessions in all. The meetings were conducted by Sylvester S. Newlin and Parris Car. The attendance was good. A real revival spirit was manifested. A renewed interest in Bible study is evident.

Irwin C. and Ethel Dickinson, who are located as missionaries at the Hillside Friends Indian Mission near Skiatook, Indian Territory, write encouragingly of the meetings at Vera, where Henry B. Rush is doing pastoral work, Romona, where James A. Griffith is located, and their own meeting. They think the country a good place for Friends, and ask that all seeking homes in the West write for particulars. The average attendance for the First-day morning service at Hillside is thirty-five, for the evening service, fifty. There is need for strong Christian people to live in the community, and influence others by close personal work and fellowship.

NEW GARDEN MONTHLY MEETING, N. C., TWELFTH MONTH 22, 1906.

At the session of the above named meeting held in Eleventh month, it was decided to give a whole day at the meeting next to be held, and to hold some special exercises in the afternoon—to have the roll of members called, and such other exercises as a committee designated for the purpose might have prepared.

After the business had been transacted, and the roll of members called, an adjournment of one hour was taken, when refreshments were served in the school house nearby; and the free and easy mingling together was greatly enjoyed by all, and the kindly interest one in another was promoted.

It was found that the number of members has considerably increased during the year about to close, and the total number called on the 22d was 414. Six new members were received at this session; so the number now is 420. Many are living in other localities, and could not be present. Responses came from Alabama, Idaho, Baltimore, and New Jersey, as well as from different parts of North Carolina. The joyous responses of many children to their names were a pleasant feature of the occasion. One hundred and four members were present.

Much care has been taken by the recorder, Julia S. White, to make the membership roll correct; and it is believed the names now on its list constitute the monthly meeting.

In the afternoon, the following subjects were presented: A Brief History of New Garden Monthly Meeting, by L. L. Hobbs; Loyalty to the Church, by Raymond Binford; Family Worship, by Mary C. Woody.

The historical sketch showed that the monthly meeting was established in 1754, the first meeting being held the 27th of Seventh month of that year. The quarterly meeting authorizing it was held at Old Neck, in Perquimans County, in the Fifth month of the same year. The minutes of the monthly meeting, from the first, have been preserved, and are in the vault at Guilford College. These minutes contain many interesting records, especially with respect to marriages, and disownments for "marrying out." Sometimes as many as four marriages were accomplished in one day.

The monthly meeting contained preparative meetings twenty and even forty miles distant.

The discussion of this early history developed a good deal of interest.

The presentation of the subject of Loyalty to the Church, by Raymond Binford, was strikingly interesting: We should be loyal because of the great opportunity presented in the Church for service.

The discussion of this topic was participated in by Thomas Newlin, Jno. W. Woody, Mary M. Hobbs, F. S. Blair, Mary E. M. Davis, Albert Peele and others.

Mary C. Woody spoke with great effectiveness on Family Worship, which she considered at the foundation of religious service, and as necessary to make our social worship in our meetings what it ought to be. Many others spoke on this subject, and the deep interest manifested was believed to foretoken greater things in this old monthly meeting. Indeed, the general interest and satisfaction which marked this day's proceedings have probably never been greater throughout the long period of the existence of New Garden Monthly Meeting.

The occasion was one of such general satisfaction and interest, that it is believed some account of it may be acceptable to the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

Events and Comments.

A novel movement has been started by the Young Men's Christian Association. Some are pleased to call it the "Laymen's Missionary Movement." They propose to evangelize the world in twenty-five years. The men promoting the work are hard-headed business men, only slightly versed in ecclesiastical undertakings. They propose to investigate the present methods used by the different churches, also to visit the several countries of the world, and to promote the undertaking on a strictly business basis. We like the tone of the project and predict good results. When the "children of light" are as wise as the "children of this world," then something good can be expected. Possibly we should state

NAUGHTY "SCHOOLMA'AMS."

NOT ALWAYS FAIR TO THEMSELVES.

"I taught school for a number of years," writes a Vancouver lady, "and like many other brain workers forgot how necessary the right kind of food is, and therefore suffered greatly from indigestion.

"My system became run down, my blood impoverished, and I had to take a year's holiday in the hope of regaining my strength.

"I saw Grape-Nuts food highly spoken of, tried the food and became very fond of it. After eating it with cream, only for breakfast, I gained quickly in strength and energy, and went back to work.

"When I married I soon convinced my husband that it was his heavy breakfasts of meat, potatoes, hot biscuit and white bread, that caused his feelings of languor in the mornings.

"Since eating Grape-Nuts and fruit, he has become hearty and well.

"It is now many years since we began to use Grape-Nuts and the food seems as 'necessary in our household as salt.' A favorite desert is alternate layers of sliced apples, sugar, nutmeg and Grape-Nuts, cooked in the oven until the apples are done." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville" in pkgs. "There's a reason."

this truth in different language, since it simply means that the common sense consecrated to money making, shall be used to further the spiritual welfare of the race.

Some one has been computing the relative amounts donated by the citizens of the United States to philanthropic purposes during the past few years. A number of interesting facts are revealed. There is a decided falling off since 1901. Of course, it is impossible to get at accurate results because a great deal of charity is never reported. No one outside of the individuals giving and receiving know anything about it. According to the figures reported, educational institutions receive, by far, the greatest contributions. Art galleries, hospitals and asylums are next in order.

In a recent speech, Senator Hale, of Maine, said "I don't know that the people of the country appreciate, and I don't know that the Senate does, that two-thirds of the revenues of the country to-day are devoted to the payment of burdens of past wars, like pensions; and expenditures in view of future wars. The Springfield Republican offers the following comment: "Despite all our boasted advance in enlightenment, mental and moral, governments are still thinking wrong when such things can exist without thought or challenge, or any general attempt to bring about a better state of things. It is, however, to be said that the cause of peace and goodwill between nations is more talked about and respected to-day than ever before. But what a long road we have yet to traverse!"

Alexander Johnston Cassatt, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., died suddenly at his home in Philadelphia, the 28th. His death was due to heart failure. No one, not even his physicians, expected the crisis, although he had been suffering from the effects of whooping cough which he contracted from his grandchildren last summer. Some of his intimate friends say his death was caused by a broken heart, the result of grief for graft among high officials in the company which came to his knowledge through the recent coal investigation. Here was a man in whom special business ability was combined with energy and integrity. During his latter years he devoted himself unreservedly to the upbuilding of a great railroad system. He attempted, as far as we are able to judge, to confine his operations and those of the entire company to strictly legitimate methods measured by the present standards of business ethics. Yet he found himself, after years of faithful effort, surrounded by and operating with men who were disloyal to the confidence which he had placed in them, and traitors to the policies which he had honestly striven to promote. Here again is a noble example of the vicarious suffering which we are beginning to feel in our complex modern society as never before. How long will it be before those in high positions in our financial institutions will realize the importance of their moral integrity? A few more martyrs like A. J. Cassatt may do much to awaken the public conscience to strict honesty in corporate action.

WHAT SULPHUR DOES.

FOR THE HUMAN BODY IN HEALTH AND DISEASE.

Costs nothing to try.

The mention of sulphur will recall to many of us the early days when our mothers and grandmothers gave us our daily dose of sulphur and molasses every spring and fall.

It was the universal spring and fall "blood purifier," tonic and cure-all, and, mind you this old-fashioned remedy was not without merit.

The idea was good, but the remedy was crude and unpalatable, and a large quantity had to be taken to get any effect.

Nowadays we get all the beneficial effects of sulphur in a palatable, concentrated form, so that a single grain is far more effective than a tablespoonful of the crude sulphur.

In recent years research and experiment have proven that the best sulphur for medicinal use is that obtained from Calcium (Calcium Sulphide) and sold in drug stores under the name of Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They are small chocolate coated pellets and contain the active medicinal principle of sulphur in a highly concentrated, effective form.

Few people are aware of the value of this form of sulphur in restoring and maintaining bodily vigor and health; sulphur acts directly on the liver and excretory organs and purifies and enriches the blood by the prompt elimination of waste material.

Our grandmothers knew this when they dosed us with sulphur and molasses every spring and fall, but the crudity and impurity of ordinary flowers of sulphur were often worse than the disease, and cannot compare with the modern concentrated preparations of sulphur, of which Stuart's Calcium Wafers is undoubtedly the best and most widely used.

They are the natural antidote for liver and kidney troubles and cure constipation and purify the blood in a way that often surprises patient and physician alike.

Dr. R. M. Wilkins, while experimenting with sulphur remedies, soon found that the sulphur from Calcium was superior to any other form. He says: "For liver, kidney and blood troubles, especially when resulting from constipation or malaria, I have been surprised at the results obtained from Stuart's Calcium Wafers. In patients suffering from boils and pimples and even deep-seated carbuncles, I have repeatedly seen them dry up and disappear in four or five days, leaving the skin clear and smooth. Although Stuart's Calcium Wafers is a proprietary article and sold by druggists, and for that reason tabooed by many physicians, yet I know of nothing so safe and reliable for constipation, liver and kidney troubles, and especially in all forms of skin diseases, as this remedy."

At any rate people who are tired of pills, cathartics and so-called blood "purifiers" will find in Stuart's Calcium Wafers, a far safer, more palatable and effective preparation.

The agitation in behalf of the Congo Free State is gaining considerable headway among prominent citizens in the United States. On the 10th inst. Senator Lodge of Massachusetts introduced in the Senate a Resolution, pledging the Senate's support to the President "in any steps he may deem it wise to take in co-operation with, or in aid of, any of the Powers signatory of the Treaty of Berlin, which shall seek to ameliorate the condition of the Congo Free State, and redress any evils now existent there." No action has yet been taken and letters from our readers to their senators might be timely. J. Pierpont Morgan, Lyman Abbott and others, jointly signed a recent letter addressed to Secretary Root, calling his attention to the conditions in that country, and asking him, on behalf of the American people, to use the moral support of the United States Government to correct abuses.

Wm. Dudley Foulke has just completed an investigation of the situation in the Indian Territory. He was sent out by Pres. Roosevelt to determine, if possible, the extent of graft practiced by unscrupulous white men in dealing with the Indian tribes, which are allowed to dispose of their lands. His report has not been made public, but we are credibly informed that when it does appear it will reveal a great deal of dishonesty. The law prohibits individuals from procuring more than one site or lot in a town. Through the method of fraudulent schedules a number of persons among the whites and civilized Indians have secured town lots aggregating millions of dollars. Certain tracts in Muskogee that are worth $300.00 a front foot are involved. Grafters have

No better practical proof that coffee is a drug can be required than to note how the nerves become unstrung in women who habitually drink it.

The stomach, too, rebels at being continually drugged with coffee and tea—they both contain the drug—caffeine. Ask your doctor.

An Iowa woman tells the old story thus:

"I had used coffee for six years and was troubled with headaches, nervousness and dizziness. In the morning upon rising I used to belch up a sour fluid, regularly.

"Often I got so nervous and miserable I would cry without the least reason, and I noticed my eyesight was getting poor.

"After using Postum a while, I observed the headaches left me, and soon the belching of sour fluid stopped (water brash from dyspepsia). I feel decidedly different now, and I am convinced that it is because I stopped coffee, and began to use Postum. I can see better now, my eyes are stronger.

"A friend of mine did not like Postum, but when I told her to make it like it said on the package, she liked it all right." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Always boil Postum well and it will surprise you.

been enabled to get lots to which they were not entitled under the law by employing dummy purchasers who transferred the titles as soon as the deal was closed. It is rumored that some of these grafters are intimately connected with those in authority in government circles.

A conference for the purpose of associating Charity Organizations and workers was held in Richmond, Ind., last week. The reasons put forth for co-operation in this work are instructive. The chief purpose is to prevent duplication of aid, and of imposition by unworthy people, thereby depriving some of the worthy ones on the one hand, and encouraging pauperism on the other. It was held by some that there should be a committee or central council consisting of one or more representatives from each organization in the city, who should constitute a kind of clearing house through which the several bodies together with the township trustee, can get information as to the needs of applicants for help, and also as to what aid they are getting from other sources. In other words, it is to be an information bureau. Resolutions favoring this plan were adopted.

THE PRAIRIE-SCHOONER.

"See yonder on the hillside that white speck,
That slowly creeps along its westward way;
'Tis grander than triumphal car of old,
Ay, grander than the fleetest man-of-war!"

"What—not that prairie schooner that I saw, Drawn by a wretched, tired, panting team?"

"Yes, it is civilization's magic car,
That pioneers before the giant, Steam,
And all the grandeur in the giant's wake.

Its driver is a hero of rare mold,
A Hercules of courage, fearing naught;
Grandly he goes to break the ancient sod;
And bow the forest to his dauntless will.

And Luxury and Pride at last abide,
'In that fair land which he has suffered for,
And scarcely ever give a thought to him.

'Tis such as he that make a nation great,
Far more than generals, statesmen, financiers;
He delves amid the sunless caves for stone,
And makes a sure foundation, deep and strong,
With few to praise him in his arduous task;
They rear the superstructure in the sun,
'Mid song of birds and much acclaim of men."

—Romney Blakefield.

Easiest-Reading Bible

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink running from Genesis to Revelation binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under a mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere Bible reader are brought to light and tied together. In the "International"

Christian Workers' Bible

the Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority on Bible themes, has arranged on this plan

Three Thousand Selected Texts

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class but for all who read the Scriptures.

Prominent people's opinions of the Christian Workers' Bible:

JOHN WANAMAKER: I have received the marvelously beautiful and complete work—"International Christian Workers' Bible." It is an advance of anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable for Christian Workers.

LYMAN ABBOTT: This edition will be valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible on great spiritual themes directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries and theological treatises.

REV. JAMES A. WORDEN, D. D., LL. D., Supt. Sabbath-School Training, Presbyterian Board of Sunday-School Work: In this beautiful "International" Christian Workers' Bible, a specimen of the finest typography, I have a complete copy of the Scriptures accurately and tastefully marked, according to the very best ideas of Bible marking.

Doctor Hurlbut has been especially happy in deciding upon those passages which treat of the theme of salvation, and upon his division of this general theme into classes. I went through the Christian Workers' Bible testing the accuracy of the classification, and I found it complete in every instance.

These beautiful printed red lines and letters are guides to the great temple of the Bible. This volume must prove a treasure to all Sabbath-school teachers, to all Y. M. C. A. members, and also to the members of the Epworth League or Christian Endeavor, and, indeed, to all Bible readers.

C. B. BLACKALL, Editor of Periodicals, American Baptist Pub'n Society: It seems to me this Bible is indispensable. It seems to be lacking in nothing either mechanical or otherwise as a practical aid.

The Christian Workers' Bible is bound in fine Morocco, Divinity Circuit, with overlapping edges; round corners, gold edges with red underneath. Size of page, 8½ x 5¼ inches, beautifully printed in large, clear type on extra fine paper.

The Christian Workers' Bible will be SENT FREE for examination, all charges prepaid.

Every Ambitious Young Man

Should read the article on Thrift, written by

DR. ORISON SWETT MARDEN, Editor of Success.

This is just an excerpt on

Inducing the Habit of Saving

"ANYTHING which will encourage the habit of saving in this extravagant age is a blessing. The temptations on every hand are so alluring that it is very difficult for a young man of ordinary self-control to resist them and to save his money.

"I believe that life-insurance is doing more to induce the habit of saving than almost anything else.

"I know of nothing which will cover up more blemishes, put out of sight more business weaknesses, cover up more surely the lack of foresight and thrift than a good life-insurance policy. It has proven a friend to thousands who have not been friends to themselves. It has shielded thousands of families who would have been homeless without it; it has sent to college multitudes of boys and girls who but for it would not have gone; it has started thousands of young men in business who, but for it, either would not have started at all, or would have been delayed for years. It has lifted the mortgage from thousands of homes."

This article should be read from start to finish by every young man. The Prudential has published it in pamphlet form and will send a copy free to anyone who will write for it.

A Great Creed.

We are thankful for anyone who will show us a flaw in our foundations or an error in our estimates, for whatever is untrue is injurious to our well-being. But we want a great creed—one worthy of God—declaring His tender love, and assuring us that whatever love can suggest to bless man, God will do it. We want a creed that will reveal a love great as God's omnipotence, and energetic as God's creative and sustaining handiwork. We want, moreover, a great Saviour: one whose grace is dynamic, whose forgiveness is real, whose patience is eternal, whose love cherishes feebleness into strength and victory. We want a Saviour, human to be approached, divine to be trusted. For only God can save; only He who made us can mend us.—Richard Glover in The Christian World.

By ALLEN C. and RICHARD H. THOMAS

AFRAID OF FADING INK.

A little girl was recently taken to Washington to see the city. As she went through the beautiful capitol, the splendid library and the great department buildings, she felt a natural pride in the greatness of her country. Finally, her father and mother took her to see the original copy of the Declaration of Independence. Here she had a sad set-back. To her great sorrow, she discovered that the ink with which the Declaration is written has faded, until it has become almost unreadable. She was told that some time it will disappear entirely, so that the letters will not be visible. With tears in her eyes the little girl said: "Then shall we lose all our freedom, and all our liberty, and not be a country of our own any more?"

It was a natural question and a natural fear. Older persons have sometimes had a similar fear. A prominent Friend recently expressed himself thus: "For years I have felt, and sometimes said, that if I could believe the assertions of scholars like Cheyne, Driver, and their German and Dutch authorities, I should be constrained to admit that Christianity was a delusion." The dear man is laboring under the same pitiful confusion which caused the little girl's fear.

Those of us who have had more experience than this child possessed know perfectly well that our freedom, and our liberty, and our nationality do not depend on the preservation of the ink with which the Declaration is written. Even if it could be proved that Franklin wrote the Declaration, and not Jefferson, as we supposed, still our freedom would be unimpaired, and our liberties unaffected. Freedom, liberty, nationality are kept or lost by the citizens themselves. These precious things are staked, not on the ink of a piece of parchment, but on the faith and the ideals of the men who compose the country. If we prize liberty enough to keep our ballot pure, our legislatures clean; if we prize it enough to sacrifice our own narrow interests for the common welfare; if we prize it enough to fight national and social evils as we would fight a fire which threatens our own home, then liberty is safe and we can watch the ink fade with composure. But if we are recreant to duty, and sluggish in our zeal for pure and noble citizenship, then no renovation of the old Declaration in ever so fresh ink can save our liberties.

Now all this applies to our Friend's fear that Christianity may after all turn out to be an illusion. All that Driver, and the other scholars mentioned, have done is to suggest, as a result of historical study, new dates for the composition of the Old Testament books, and different authorship than that assigned by tradition. Does the reality of Divine forgiveness hang on such a slender thread as that? Is the infinite Grace of God indissolubly bound up with the date of Judges or the authorship of Daniel? Does the efficacy of communion with a loving Father depend on the preservation of the traditional view of the Pentateuch? It is a pity to make such confusion—it is lamentable that good men should make such a hazard of our precious faith. We laugh at the little girl's fear, but the similar confusion of the timid Christians, who think that the unveiling of the Father's face may prove an illusion if their theories of the Old Testament are shaken, is not laughable, because it throws a multitude of simple-minded persons into dire perplexity.

How can a Friend, who is heir of the priceless jewel of spiritual freedom, won by our Quaker fathers at such cost, fall into such confusion? How can he ever identify the things of the Spirit with the letter? How can he say that his heart's own experience may turn out false if the ink of the letter fades? Let him turn to Paul's great Corinthian chapter, where he glories that the old system is fading, where he asserts even that Moses knew it would fade, and where in the place of the letter that fadeth, he puts the spirit that liveth, in place of the glory that passeth away, he puts that which excelleth in glory, in place of Moses, with the veil over his face to conceal the fact that the glory is fading, he puts the living experience of being steadily transformed into the image of the Lord as he gazes unveiled upon His face. Is that an illusion?

The religion of Jesus Christ is not a flimsy system that is at the mercy of Hebrew scholars. It is the everlasting reality of the coming of God into our humanity, and those who have found God through Christ, and who are living by the power of His presence, are not afraid of fading ink. R. M. J.

TOGETHER.

There is a steady movement in the Christian church, to-day, toward unity. The word that has worked wonders in every branch of society, in every line of activity is "together." This ought to have been a Christian word from the beginning, but once again the children of this world proved wiser than the children of the Light, and the church has had to learn the value of "together" from the commercial world. But, little by little, the church has learned the magic word. A century ago, the tendency everywhere, was to split and divide. The Presbyterians separated until the phrase "split P's" became a grim joke. Friends were caught in the general tendency, and "separated" themselves almost out of existence. We print this week an interesting account of one of these forgotten separations.

It is a cause for devout thanksgiving that a wiser generation has come. The tendency is toward union, toward fellowship and brotherhood. We are interested in action, in work, in deeds. We see the value in the pull together, and we are, too, thank God, more interested in human needs than we are in fine drawn, logical distinctions about theological abstractions. We shall never see again in any living church uniformity of doctrine, nor shall we, probably, ever see uniformity of practice. Uniformity is incompatible with life, with growth, with progress, with power. But we shall see unity. We shall learn to love each other with our differences. We shall learn to have fellowship with divergencies. We shall learn to pull together, and to mass our strength for the battles of Armageddon, even though we do not wear the same coats, or think alike about the six days of creation.

The belated man, born out of due season, who goes out into the seed field of this needy world, to-day, and scatters random talk about "disunity," "dissension," "separation," unless there is uniformity, is sowing tares. That is the language of the past century. That is an attitude of fossilized ignorance. "Ye know not what spirit ye are of," said the Galilean of those in His day who allowed their views of uniformity to kill out their human love and sympathy. There are such persons to-day, but they are as much out of date as the dodo and the kangaroo. They do not command the future. They are doomed. The sign by which we conquer is unity, fellowship, brotherhood, love—"together."

EDITORIAL NOTE.

Those who read the "Publisher's Department" in our columns last week will have noticed already that there has been a change in the editorial staff of the paper. Rufus M. Jones, who has been the editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, since its origin, is, henceforth, to be editorial contributor, and Herman Newman, who has for four years been assistant editor, has been promoted to the editorship. There will be no change in the general management or the policy of the paper. It will stand, as it always has stood, for a vital, dynamic Quakerism, and it will deal fairly with all types and aspects of Quaker faith. Rufus M. Jones will write one or more signed editorials each week.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE CHILDREN OF PEACE.

BY FRANK CORNELL.

Within some three or four miles from the town of Newmarket, in one of the finest districts of the fertile province of Ontario, there stands a group of disused buildings, illustrating the unprofitableness of separations. From the time of George Keith until now, the Society of Friends has been weakened by various secessions. The leaders of these separation movements were generally men of strong personalities and limited education, and the founder of the "Children of Peace" was no exception.

In the year 1800, Timothy Rogers brought a party of Friends from Pennsylvania and New York, and settled them in the then wilderness, thirty miles north of Toronto. The land was fertile and gave a rich reward for the labor bestowed upon it, and in a few years these energetic settlers built a meeting house, and a monthly meeting was established under Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Among the members of this meeting was one David Wilson, of Irish parentage, whose home had formerly been in Dutchess County, New York. David's farm was four miles from the meeting house on Yonge Street, but this distance was nothing to a hardy pioneer, and twice each week found him at the place of worship, until Queen Street Preparative Meeting was set up near his home. He is described as an earnest member, spending much time in meditation, and frequently taking part in vocal service. It soon became evident, however, that his messages were not helpful, and some of his methods very radical, for which he was dealt with by the monthly meeting as the following minute will show:

"Yonge Street Monthly Meeting held 13th day of Eighth month, 1812." "Reported from Queen Street Preparative Meeting that David Willson has so far disregarded the good order that should be observed amongst us, as not to rise from his seat when a friend appeared in supplication in a meeting for worship, and a few weeks ago, stood up in a first-day meeting, and expressed his intention of separating from us, intending to open up his own House in order to hold Meetings on the first and fifth Days of the week, and since that time he with some others, of our members, have not attended our meeting, but have been in the practice of attending Meetings at said David Willsons. The following are appointed to visit him and report to next Meeting.”*

The minutes of the next meeting record his disownment.

Every strong-minded leader will find some followers, no matter how strange his doctrines, and when David Wilson proceeded, in 1814, to build a meeting house on his own farm and establish “The Children of Peace,” his friends gathered about him. But the man who had for years worshipped in the quiet manner of Friends now went to many extremes. His meeting house was furnished with an immense pipe organ, a brass band of twenty instruments organized, and a well-trained choir provided to sing at each meeting. The “Davidites,” as they were commonly called, flourished for a number of years. In 1825 the “Temple” was built, David himself being the architect. This temple is a three-story building, seventy-five feet high, surmounted by a gilded globe, on which is painted the word “Peace.”

In the centre of the auditorium stands the “altar,” which is truly a work of art, and we are informed that it required the work of one man three hundred and sixty days to build it. Like other mystics, David had a symbolic meaning to everything in the meeting house and temple. Services were held in the temple fifteen times a year. Occasionally, there were “illuminations,” when the light from hundreds of candles shone through the 2,952 panes of glass in the windows and spires, “representing Christianity enlightening the world.”

Voluntary contributions poured in, and it is affirmed, that, notwithstanding, the great cost of maintaining such elaborate ceremonies, the Society never lacked for funds.

David Wilson had his own ideas of education, and a girls’ school was established where young women were not only taught the ordinary English branches, but spinning, sewing, knitting and cooking.

Thus, “The Children of Peace” continued to flourish until First month 19th, 1866, when the founder passed away. His son, John, for a short time continued to lead the movement, but it soon began to dwindle, and, to-day, nothing remains but the fairly well preserved buildings, to remind the beholder of the danger and futility of fanaticism.

What are the lessons that we, as a Society, may learn from this religious bubble?

First, that disownment does not end all danger to the church. Someone has very truly said, “To conquer fanaticism, you must tolerate it; the shuttlecock of religious differences soon falls to the ground when there are no battle-dores to beat it backward and forward.”

Surely we have had experience enough to teach us to be tolerant towards those who may differ from us. Yonge Street Meeting still continues (now held at Newmarket,) but its membership is not larger than it was one hundred years ago.

Divisions and separations have weakened the Society of Friends in Canada, as well as elsewhere, and if we ever become a strong church, it must be by that perfect union in Christ, which makes us thoughtful, tolerant and earnest in our work for the Master.

THE PROGRESS OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE AMONG FRIENDS IN PHILADELPHIA.

BY JOSHUA L. BAILY.

From that time on for eight years, that is until 1882, notwithstanding the minutes of the yearly meeting advised total abstinence from all that would intoxicate, the reports came up from the quarters as before, only indicating the number of those who used ardent spirits or spirituous liquors, the two terms being used as synonymous.

But in 1882 the monthly meetings were directed to report the number of members making use of any beverages that would intoxicate, and the formal query (the fourth) was revised by substituting the words “intoxicating liquors,” in place of “spirituous liquors.” The application of this new rule which was intended to apply to all malt liquors very largely increased the number of those reported beyond that of any previous year. Accordingly in the year 1883, the number reported reached 256, or three times as great as the highest number ever before reported, and nearly five times the average of the preceding sixty years. In the eleven years following, which was up to 1893 inclusive, the average number reported was 220, the lowest number in any of those years having been

191, when by the advice of the committee appointed to consider the subject, it was concluded that hereafter the reporting to the yearly meetings of the number of persons using intoxicating beverages should be discontinued. The report of the committee I have here and will read.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

"An examination of the records of the yearly meeting shows that this question is one that has exercised the minds of Friends for the past two hundred years. As the evil results to the community of the manufacture, trading in and use of intoxicating liquors became more and more manifest, they have increased their efforts steadily to advance the cause of temperance in the Society, until the general sentiment of the yearly meeting has now progressed from that of temperance to total abstinence.

"In view of the alarming increase in the use of intoxicants and especially of fermented liquors, within the past ten years, by the population of this country, as indicated by the official reports of the International Revenue Department of the United States Government, and that the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that the statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits than to any other source, we feel that the present is not a time when our religious society should relax in any wise its efforts to warn and guard its members from this ensnaring vice, or should ever seem to take a backward step in its testimony against it.

"With a view of harmonizing, as far as possible, the honest difference of opinion that exists in the minds of the members of the yearly meeting as to the best measure to be used in the future in promoting total abstinence among our members, we are united in proposing that the report hitherto made to the yearly meeting annually of the number of persons using intoxicating beverages, be discontinued.

"We, however, recommend that each of our Men's Monthly Meetings appoint a committee of judicious Friends, who shall ascertain annually, by personal enquiry, or otherwise, how many of their numbers have partaken of intoxicating beverages or have given or sold them to others within the preceding year. These beverages are to include fermented cider, wine, and malt liquors as well as other intoxicants.

"Such committees should labor in Christian love to counsel the young, and to help and restore the tempted, so as to bring about, as far as possible, a willing and harmonious support of the cause of total abstinence from all intoxicants by our members, both for their own safety and as an example to others; agreeably to the words of Holy Scripture: 'It is good neither to eat flesh or drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth or is offended or is made weak.' Rom. xiv, 21.

"These committees are to report to their several monthly meetings the result of their labors, with the number of those who disregard the concern of the yearly meeting; which reports shall be forwarded to the quarterly meeting next preceding yearly meeting. Quarterly meetings shall report to the yearly meetings whether the monthly meetings have attended to this subject, and state if there has been any improvement or otherwise since the previous year, but without giving statistics.

"We recommend that the following advices be added to those now in use, and read annually in the monthly and preparative meetings, viz:

"That our members wholly abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and in culinary preparations.

"That they avoid, as far as practicable, patronizing hotels, restaurants or stores where such liquors are sold, and in no case sign petitions for, or accept, licenses for the sale of alcoholic beverages, or rent or lease their buildings for the manufacture or sale of such liquors."

This report, and especially the closing recommendations, comprise the most advanced pronouncement on the use of intoxicants ever made by authority of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and there is good ground to believe that it has the approval and is regarded in the practice of our members generally.

The minute made by the yearly meeting in 1904 states that the indulgence seems to be confined to a very small percentage of our members, and in nearly all cases to only occasional gratifications of an appetite for mild alcoholic drinks.

Two hundred years ago Friends kept slaves, at least those Friends kept slaves who could afford to do so. There was no such thing as a testimony then against slavery, but that testimony had its beginning, and gradually and steadily swept through the Society, until by the close of the first century of Quakerism in America it could be said, with a very few exceptions, members of the Society of Friends were clear of slaveholding.

Two hundred years ago there was no testimony in the Society against the use of intoxicating drinks, in fact, their use as a beverage among Friends, as has already been stated was almost universal. The only testimony they had to bear in the matter was against excess. The testimony against the utter disuse was of very slow growth, but it was a steady growth because it had Truth and Reason to commend it. Although we have not yet reached the point where we are able to say that there is not in all the land a Quaker who indulges this injurious appetite, yet we think it may be claimed that among Quakers everywhere throughout this country, total abstinence is a rule, and indulgence the exception.

I said a word about the concurrence in the views of the Clerk, as expressed by an English Friend who attended Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1845. I have reason to think that he fairly represented the views that were generally held at that time by Friends in England. I cannot speak from the book, but I well remember that John Bright made quite a stir in the yearly meeting some forty or more years ago by a vigorous speech in denunciation of the habit of wine drinking. I have not anything to refer to but memory, but I recall that he said that he had not been a total abstainer all his life, but that during the thirty-six years that he had then been a householder he had not indulged in the use of wine; that he did not own a decanter or even a wine glass; that he often had 'my Lord this,' and 'my Lord that,' to dine with him, and that he would say to them that he thought that for once in their lives they could do without their accustomed beverage, and in the yearly meeting he earnestly appealed to Friends to abandon the custom which was the parent of so large a part of vice, misery and poverty by which they were surrounded. And I remember, too, the very active part taken somewhere about that time by his sister, Margaret Lucas, who afterwards became widely known, both in America and England, in her earnest labors in the cause of abstinence. It must have been that from about that time a very great advance was made among Friends in England toward the position which they have since attained.

At a temperance meeting held during the week of the yearly meeting in Leeds, last year (1905), one of the speakers declared that 99 per cent. of the Quakers in England were total abstainers. I was lead to question the accuracy of this statement, but this I quite believe, that Friends in England have reached a high watermark in this great reform.

The Temperance Association of English Friends, although a distinct organization, is in close touch with the yearly meeting, having its cordial encouragement and the privilege of annually reporting to that meeting.

That Association has a salaried secretary who occupies an office in Devonshire House, where the yearly meeting is usually held, and here he is always accessible, and maintains a correspondence with all the branch temperance associations of Friends throughout the Kingdom. Numerous meetings are held not only in Friends' meeting houses, but elsewhere, and an active propaganda is kept up throughout the year.

Speaking of Friends' meeting houses brings to my recollection the fact that when at a period within the memory of some who are present, the use of this meeting house was asked for a Friends' temperance meeting, it was denied, so small was the sympathy felt for the cause at that time. I doubt whether any Friends' meeting house in Philadelphia could have then been had for a temperance meeting, but we may rejoice in the fact that the doors are open for us now, not only here, but in other meeting houses within our limits, and I should be sorry to think that the doors of any Friends' meeting house within the borders of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting would now be closed against us.

One other fact I must not omit to mention, that there was a time, and this, too, within the memory of many who now are living, when the principal brewers in Philadelphia were Quakers, so that looking backward over conditions which once existed among us, I think we have much occasion for congratulation and encouragement, and should feel stimulated to go forward in confidence and hope to do our utmost for the good cause which has been so far advanced.

The morning light which breaks over the purple hills comes not suddenly, but slowly, yet surely. This is a wise provision, and as in the world of nature, so in the world of morals; as the light advances, the darkness recedes. The march is steadily onward, and time has no record of its backward step.

Some Views on Present Day Topics.

TOLERATION.

BY SAMUEL H. HODGES.

I have long time thought of writing to THE AMERICAN FRIEND upon the above subject in connection with the division of opinion existing among us concerning doctrinal matters. On account of the circumstances of my return from a backslidden state of soul some 31 years ago, I have thought myself favorably placed for unbiased judgment between the two parties.

At that time, being convinced of the dreadful consequences of sin, more especially to my own life; and being unable to believe many of the statements in the Scriptures, taken literally, I simply came to Jesus Christ and accepted him as my Saviour and Lord, who should guide me into all truth and save me from my sins. I did not even think particularly of the atonement he made for me on Calvary. In fact, I did not think of, or remember anything of, the system of theology learned in my young manhood. I simply came to my Saviour who I believed was able and willing to save me. Afterwards I recollected what I had before learned of the Evangelistic System of truth, and by following the Scriptural direction, not only obtained pardon and life, but the blessing of purifying power, and union with God in Christ by the Holy Spirit, which has enabled me for thirty years to do my 'Master's' will, so far as I have known it; and to endure some little hardships, misunderstanding and reproach on that account, for which I rejoice and thank Him.

This year I have attended three yearly meetings other than my own (N. Y.). In all of them there has been more or less reference to this division of opinion, and I have watched pretty closely the attitude of the two parties while these references have been made, and afterwards, and I have observed a lack of toleration on both sides.

Truth always claims the right to denounce error. Not to punish, but to expose. This is the least to be granted her. Those who are the most assured of the truth of their position ought to be the most calm when their views are opposed. All error is poisonous to some degree. The Older Thought is quite sure the Modern Thought is such, and the Modern Thought advocate is no less confident that his Older Thought Friend is encased in a pitiful armour of superstition and ignorance. Now, the question arises—does the power which comes to us by the Holy Spirit, enable us to hear our opinions spoken plainly against, and their supposed evil consequences pointed out, without resentment, and without interposing any authority we may happen to possess, for the purpose of stopping our fellow member who on this subject differs from us?

If the Modern Thought professor is right, he must endeavor by all appropriate means to show it, and to show its superiority to the older system. But, inasmuch as the consequences, according to his teaching and belief, are not so terribly serious he can afford to be moderate in his language and demeanor. Now the Older Thought professor believes in his heart that the acceptance of the views of his opposing friend, is destructive not only of spiritual life in the world, but of the soul in the world to come; therefore, stronger language and more emphatic action is to be expected from him. To him sin is fraught with everlasting consequences. Modern Thought by its very name has the burden of proof thrown upon it. It is modern. It seeks a hearing. Some respect and deference is due to those whom it seeks to supplant in the public esteem. Above all it should not wince when told of its novelty in the church, but should rather justify its existence there by an exhibition of its points in himself and others as well as by its supposed reasonableness. This was the Pauline method, as seen in the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians and Hebrews, etc. To allow the Modern Thought advocate perfect freedom in writing and speaking for weeks, months and years, then to shut down the first declaration of opposite teaching, on the score of making dissension and injuring peoples' feelings, seems to be an unworthy line of procedure calculated to produce division, strife and hard feelings.

Having written thus, permit me to express my own views briefly in order to establish my impartial position. I do not believe it necessary in order for salvation that a man should believe and understand all the particulars of the atonement as set out in many of the denominational systems of theology. Some of the thirty years of my preaching life have been occupied in work among the poor and illiterate, in both England and America. To have gone to them with minute, hair-splitting definitions and terms about this or any other doctrine would have insured utter failure. So, also, if I had gone to them with the vague generalities and philosophical notions of new theology.

I have tried to imagine the effect upon an ordinary congregation of working men of telling them that religion was "Spiritual gravitation." How lucid and enlightening! Christ as the ever present Son of God, able and willing to save to the uttermost—to make good men out of bad men, and good women out of bad women, was, and is still, the word—which reaches and saves sinners. For progress in divine life, the deeper things of God must be prayerfully and Scripturally considered, and diligently sought after; and this progress will depend upon the accuracy of our views of truth. In my humble opinion the standard of accuracy will be the truth as it was "once delivered to the saints," as set forth in the Scriptures.

I have many times rejoiced that I belong to a Society of Christians who gave considerable liberty of thought and speech to its members and ministers. Truth, nor its Author, has anything to fear in the long run from liberty. The pity of it is that souls go down in the conflict, while the glory of it is that in the end life, love and power will come to many more who otherwise could not have been reached. I remember the time when I sincerely disbelieved many things which now I hold to be precious and true; therefore, I am charitably disposed towards those who now are in a position similar to mine of years ago.

It has seemed to me that the message of Friends to the Twentieth century might be one of toleration. May we not present to the world an example of a Society, (or Church if you like the word better) composed of sincere followers and worshippers of God and Christ Jesus, living in harmony, love and forbearance, who yet have opinions widely divergent on most important matters?—Is there not a Scriptural basis to be found upon which we can all agree? I look through the Scriptures and find but a very limited creed set down as essential to salvation. As a foundation the conversation of Jesus and Peter might be considered binding—"Thou art the Messiah, the Son of the living God." This, Jesus declared to be the rock on which he would build His church. Then take Paul's declaration, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and believe in thine heart that God raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Can we not all unite on this Scriptural foundation of truth, and allow liberty, and bear with each other on the necessities of further development? Let there be light, and let there be liberty with love; but do not let us expect to make omelets without breaking eggs. If I am saved as well as I ought to be I will bear to be told of my error, real or supposed, and still keep love in my heart; but error and truth must contend as certainly as that Christ and Belial can have no concord with each other.

The verses intervening between the present lesson and the last should be read. The American Revision reads, "Jehovah God," instead of "God," all through the lesson.

The subject of the present selection is one of the most interesting in human history—temptation and the yielding thereto. It is impossible to read the story without feeling that allegory must enter to a considerable extent. The origin of evil is not described, but the effect of sin is told in unmistakable language, which brings to every heart the evidence of its truth in one's own experiences. The sinful desire is excited by an outward object. The serpent is the symbol or representative of the power of temptation. It should be noted that there is nothing said in the narrative identifying the serpent with the Evil One. In fact, the first identification of the serpent with Satan is found in the Apocrypha. Compare also Rev. 12: 9; 20: 2.

The scene is laid in the Garden of Eden. Eden was a district, and if it could be located, it would be in Mesopotamia between the Euphrates and the Tigris. The Garden is represented as in this district. It was an ideal place for human happiness and human development, for every part of human nature was provided for.

1. "Serpent." The serpent has been, since time immemorial, a symbol of wisdom, and principally in a bad sense. Its peculiar method of locomotion and its habits suggest something mysterious. "Subtil." Wily, crafty. Job 5: 12. "He said." The serpent is represented as speaking. "Yea, hath God said," etc. Note how the emphasis is laid on the slight restriction, while the many privileges are ignored. Reference is clearly made to Gen. 2: 16, 17.

2, 3. The woman in her reply shows that she knows of the prohibition, and adds that they are not even to touch the tree. "Tree which is in the midst of the garden." See Gen. 2: 17. Note that it is not the "Tree of Knowledge," but of the "Knowledge of Good and Evil."

4, 5. The serpent first denies flatly what they had been told, and then insinuates that the prohibition is not for their sakes, but because God does not want them to become like Him—in other words that God is envious of them, and selfish. What the serpent said was true, but not in the sense that he intended the woman to understand, and in which she did understand. "The one point of truth is skilfully set by the tempter, so as to give entrance to the falsehood." It is a fact in human history that confident assertions are very often believed, especially by the ignorant and uneducated. Many quacks and imposters take advantage of this fact.

6. Note the cumulative force of the temptation. How true to nature and experience. We are tempted and then try to find reasons why we should yield. Bodily pleasure, good to look at, refreshing to the mind—how they pile up. "Took," touched, "Did eat"—the next step. "Gave also unto her husband." Very natural in her, and very natural in him to accept. According to I Tim. 2: 14, the man sinned with his eyes open—he knew he was doing wrong.

Verses 7-12. Describe the immediate consequences of the sin. It has been even said, "From the state of childish ignorance in which unquestioning obedience was enough for them, they pass by one act of disobedience into a state in which choice and self-restraint had to be exercised." "They lost Eden, and gained a conscience." "Where art thou." Verse 9. This is "the call, which after every sin, repeats itself to the man who seeks to deceive himself and others concerning his sin." How true the picture which represents fear, one of the first consequences of sin.

13. "What is this thou hast done?" There was no escaping the question. "The serpent beguiled me." The man had laid the blame on the woman, and now she tries to shift the responsibility on the serpent. I Tim. 2: 4. Both are questioned in order to get them to acknowledge their guilt. Confession of sin is most important. "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins."

14. First comes the sentence on the serpent. The serpent being an animal can hardly be responsible, but as it is the representative of evil thoughts and suggestions, and temptation generally, it must be punished. The sentence, however, is given in terms applicable to an animal. "The mark of the serpent's curse consists in its crawling gait, and dusty food: not that it actually lived on dust, but, moving as it did with its mouth on the ground, it might readily be supposed to swallow more dust than other animals. Is. 65: 25; Micah 7: 17. "Cattle." A general term for domesticated animals. "Beast of the field." Wild animals.

15. "Enmity." The antipathy between mankind and the serpent race is great; there are comparatively few persons to-day, who do not feel an antipathy to snakes. But the words mean far more than this, for it must not be forgotten that the serpent is the representative of the power of evil. "It." The seed of the woman. "Bruise." Note it does not say kill; complete victory is not promised here, though there is a note of ultimate victory. Probably more has been read into the verse than is justified. It is a preparation for the later "Glad Tidings" of a Saviour rather than a direct prophecy of Him. The primary meaning of the words, "It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel," is not easy to determine. It could hardly mean, that in one case, the injury should be fatal, and the other not, for the bite of a serpent is as fatal in one place as another. Others think it means that the attack of the serpent (sin) will be secret, insidious, while on the part of men, it will be open and unconcealed.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Only those temptations which we encounter in the way of duty, in the path of consecration, only those, has our Lord promised us that we shall conquer. If you are in temptation for temptation's sake, with no purpose behind it, you are lost." Phillips Brooks.

2. Never dally with temptation.

Paul sets in battle array against the Christian a formidable company of antagonists, in the concluding verses of the eighth chapter of Romans. No modern writer would mention some of them, but they lay in the thought of his day just as other forms of opposition are to be reckoned with in ours. Paul covers the ground, however, in his "things to come," and "any other creature;" so that we are assured that he had in mind a God who is sufficient in the year 1907, in America, no less than for the Roman Christians of the first century.

Various religions propose forms of self-conquest, and of benevolence that savor of high moral ideals, but no other than that offered in Jesus Christ opens the way to God who works in and through His people to bring righteousness to pass. It is the teaching of the fatherhood of God, and the restoration of the broken relations with Him and our fellowmen, that form the crown of our faith, and place it above every other.

No man is a conqueror, standing alone. That does not mean that he is a weakling, but that he attains manhood only as he finds his adjustments. Some experiences seem to demand the wilderness struggle, others that of Gethsemane; but the forces of good and evil do battle in these places. As the soul's conflict is never without the hostile presence of the adversary, so it is never without the companionship of Him who is able to deliver. Then, too, our common duties stand for constant contact with our fellowmen. To gain and hold the place with them that is ours in God's plan, means the thwarting of many a device of the enemy as he works through his conquered subjects, and the conquest of many an impulse toward self-aggrandizement and self-pleasing. But we cannot leave out, on the other hand, the fellowship of the saints and the provocation to good works, which are tokens of an achieving grace among men, and of a method by which God works to lead us to victory.

"With every temptation the way of escape" is the final answer to every question as to the outcome of struggle. But it is not to be an escape by drifting. It is "through Him that loved us," and He said of Himself "I work." Spurgeon writes, "Some temptations come to the industrious, but all temptations attack the idle." The busy Christian has already conquered many of his adversaries.

QUARTERLY REPORT FOR LIRHANDA, TENTH MONTH 1, 1906.

EDGAR T. HOLE.

It is with great joy and thankfulness that we are permitted to send a report from this new outpost, where considerable time has been spent since June 2d, erecting temporary buildings.

At sunrise, Eighth month 10th, our caravan started from Kaimosi to convey missionaries and belongings to the new station at Lirhanda. My wife's conveyance was an ordinary deck chair, swung on poles, and carried by eight porters in relays of four. The children occupied separate hammocks suspended from poles, with two porters each. At 10.30 we reached our destination (12 miles distant) in a very hot sun, but none the worse for the trip. After a few busy days we were somewhat settled and quite at home in our new quarters. Needing more storage space for ourselves, and living room for our people, and a shelter under which to hold services and school, we at once began to add to our African village.

There has been no scarcity of callers. They loiter about, come and go and return from morning till night. A daily service is held with all who are on hand at the hour for worship. The average attendance, thus far, has been eighty-four per day, but this will, of course, decrease as the novelty wears off. Were it only a half dozen who are daily taught the way of eternal life we would still have cause to praise God for the opportunities and privilege of seed sowing.

We have nothing to report in the educational line as our school work is only being commenced to-day.

A small amount of branch dispensary work has been done with simple remedies supplied from Kaimosi. Only 105 patients have been treated, but even the little we can do has its place in melting down barriers and winning the people. One of our saddest cases is a little child which fell in the fire and was badly burned over body and limbs.

Half a dozen workmen are employed by the month to work about the station wherever most needed. Their principal employment has been cutting tall grass, making roads, clearing rank bush for a garden patch, and sundry jobs incidental to improving the space occupied by our buildings.

The material and labor for erecting our buildings has been supplied by the local chiefs and people, and mostly paid for with coarse trade salt. Larger poles (small trees) are now being purchased of the people for the frame of a more spacious dwelling house of mud and thatch which we hope to begin building soon.

The Roman Catholics have selected a mission site about four miles southwest of Lirhanda, and began the middle of September to erect their first temporary buildings.

Six days ago an unusually hot day was followed by a hurricane in the evening. The storm did violence to nine of our eleven thatch roofs, and drenched the contents of many buildings with water. The mudded walls of all our buildings were badly washed down by the driving rain so that water came in from the sides as well as from above. The nearby people rallied to the occasion, the following day, to repair the breaches, some even coming to help us before repairing their own damaged huts.

The chiefs and people, generally, have surpassed our expectations in their readiness to help in various ways. We thank God for the cordial feeling that appears to exist in the initial stages of the work, and only desire that it shall be a means of more speedily bringing them from the depths of heathendom to a saving knowledge of the gospel of our Lord and Saviour.

Educational.

THE WORK OF FRIENDS IN NEBRASKA.

We have, for a long time, thought of calling the attention of Friends to the opportunity for work in Nebraska. For about fifteen years, Friends have been laboring in various parts of the State, and, in 1899, an organization was formed, known as the Nebraska Church and Educational Association. The object of this Association was to maintain a college and assist in church extension work, but the Association failed to accomplish very much, aside from maintaining the college, since the entire field is under the care of Iowa Yearly Meeting, and thus the Association has no jurisdiction over the meetings.

However, the need of church extension work is greater than ever before, and there are many places which are now open to Friends. We need consecrated workers to enter these open doors; also we need pastors to hold the ground which Friends have already gained. The Friends of Nebraska and South Dakota, representing nineteen monthly meetings, with a membership of about fourteen hundred, have made request to Iowa Yearly Meeting for a new yearly meeting to be established in this field. This request has been granted, and directed to be forwarded to the Five Years' Meeting for final action. This will be a big undertaking for Friends here, as our meetings are small, and almost all the members are in limited circumstances; yet it seems imperative, as the needs of the field demand a college where our young people can be equipped for service, and a college should have a yearly meeting to back it. The college located at Central City, Nebraska, and known as "Nebraska Central College," has been in the possession of Friends for about eight years. We now have buildings and grounds valued at about thirty thousand dollars. We have this year erected a girls' dormitory at a cost of forty-five hundred dollars. Up to this time, the college had been maintained free from debt. It has just been incorporated under the laws of the State of Nebraska, and the articles of incorporation forbid us incurring a debt to exceed two thousand dollars. We have also raised five thousand dollars as a nucleus for an endowment. The work done in our college ranks with the work done in other colleges in the State, and our reputation as a college is widening. This brings added responsibility to us. Last year the enrollment reached one hundred and twelve; thus, with increased attendance and added responsibility, we find ourselves greatly hampered for lack of means to procure the faculty and equipment necessary to hold our place among the other colleges around us. The people here have loyally stood by the college, but as our numbers are few and means limited, we are about to the limit of our resources. We therefore urgently request Friends to prayerfully consider the claims of this needy field upon the Church. We feel there are those whom God has blessed with means, who would be willing to give to this cause of they but knew our great need. Any information will be cheerfully furnished.

THE OPEN ROAD.

So manifold is opportunity, so open is the road of higher success to ability, industry and character, that human life may be fairly described as a divine chance to do and be that which lies in the imagination of youth. God does not deceive the fresh, instinctive faith of childhood; life does not lie to those who trust its promises. It is common-place only to those whose natures, tastes and aims are common-place. To those who have eyes for what Carlyle so well called "the open secret," life is often severe, painful and even tragical in its happenings; but it is never less than great, and that it shall be great in its ultimate possibilities is all that we have a right to ask for it. —The Outlook.

SYMPATHY.

Sympathy is a form of Christian service. It is not a favor granted by one and received by another; it is that action by which one life enters into another's life, takes up a portion of the burden, shares the joy or success, becomes for the time being a part of that life, and contributes to it some of its own strength. It does not weaken the individuality of the life it helps, it rather strengthens it. It does not lessen its responsibilities, it helps to bear them; by relieving the tension it gives opportunity for development, by companionship gives new courage and fresh ability for advance when the assisting presence is withdrawn. —Independent.

We often do more good by our sympathy than by our labors, and render to the world a more lasting service by absence of jealousy and recognition of merit than we could ever render by the straining efforts of personal ambition. —Dean Farrar.

MARY E. GIFFORD.

Sandwich Quarterly Meeting, Mass., and especially the meeting of Friends at Central Village, has suffered an incalculable loss, in the death of Mary E. Gifford, who passed away, after an illness of five days, on the morning of Twelfth month 20th, 1906, aged sixty-five years. She was the widow of James A. Gifford, whose death occurred seven years ago. The Head of the Church committed unto her a precious gift in the ministry, which she exercised for more than thirty years, to the comfort and edification of all who were blessed with her loving message. It is probable that no other minister in the yearly meeting was called upon to attend so many funerals. She was sought by people of all classes for such occasions, being especially gifted with a sympathetic heart, and one overflowing with the Saviour's love. Her life everywhere was exemplary, and she had the confidence of all. It is said that it is easier to preach than to practice our ministry, but our dear friend did not find it so, for by the help of the Holy Spirit she was so blessed, that her public service and her everyday life were in sweet accord. She was faithful in her high calling, improving the opportunities for testimony or service as they were presented. Her life was a continual testimony to the efficacy of Divine grace to save and to keep.

Finally, the end came suddenly, and her ransomed spirit passed to the mansions in our Father's house. We do not know now, why she has been taken in the midst of her great usefulness; but as a friend writes who had known her from childhood, "Heavenly Father knows all about it. Perhaps it is permitted to bring others out into more usefulness. The will of the Lord be done, I hope her mantle may fall upon someone." The bereavement is universal throughout her native town, and we may truly say, "The Church is bereft, her family is bereft, and everybody has lost a friend, for her love embraced all."

Her funeral was held at Friends' Meeting House, Central Village, where she had ministered for so many years, upon First-day, the 23d ult. The house was crowded, although the day was stormy, and the message of comfort was given, and we had the Master's assurance, "Lo I am with you, always."

"We think so, because other people think so,
Or because, after all, we do think so,
Or because we were told so, and think we must think so,
Or because we once thought so, and think we still think so,
Or because having thought so, we think we think so."

Correspondence.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Having been much interested in the account given in THE AMERICAN FRIEND by William and Mary S. Wood, some time ago, of the opening of Western Yearly Meeting, held at Plainfield, Ind., in 1858, the thought was suggested to me, why not have a reunion on the fiftieth anniversary of all those who attended the opening, and, as I have been informed that the Yearly Meeting this year appointed a committee to look after it and report next year, I would like to suggest the setting apart of one day during the time of the Yearly Meeting, in 1908, with special request for all that attended in 1858 to be present, as far as possible, in 1908, and if some could not attend, they be requested to send letters, so that all may be heard from in some way.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I desire to say for the encouragement of the management of the paper, that I greatly enjoy the paper, and am constantly and heartily in sympathy with its spirit.

J. B. WRIGHT.

Wilmington, Ohio.

We regret that there was a printer's error, last week in the interesting extract from John Wilbur. The type made him say "weakness" where he wrote "meekness." In view of his later attitude toward London Yearly Meeting, this positive testimony is so full of interest that we reprint it in its correct form:

"And to strengthen the minds of any who may be wavering, we may well refer to the steady and unabating exercises and advices of the Yearly Meeting of London for upwards of one hundred and fifty years past—a body which has extended its concern and care over the whole society for its preservation in meekness, simplicity and purity of the Gospel, and which, in point of religious knowledge, Christian authority and weight of character, has never been exceeded in the Christian world since its establishment.—(Extracted from his letters, printed in England, 1832, pages 45 and 46.)

Christmas exercises, with a treat, were given at Damascus, O., Sabbath School. The school numbers 215.

Jesse McPherson began special meetings on the 28th ult. at Damascus, Ohio, with good interest.

T. C. Kenworthy is commencing his fifth year as pastor in Damascus, O., Friends' Meeting.

Damascus Academy, Damascus, Ohio, closed a successful term at the Christmas holidays, with Prof. W. S. Painter and Anna Branson as teachers.

The current number of The Friends' Chronicle, published at Long Beach, Cal., and edited by W. Clifford Smith, is especially attractive. A picture of Geo. Fox appears on the first cover page, and numerous illustrations fill the paper. Missionary matter is given first place. Sabbath School and educational work are also discussed.

Friends in Reserve Meeting, near Russiaville, Ind., have experienced a revival, the result of labors in a protracted meeting, conducted by Jas. W. Pierce, of Dublin, Ind., and Flora H. Holaday, of Carmel, Ind. The meetings continued from the 3d to the 26th ult. Thirty-eight professed conversion.

The Friends' meeting house, at Jericho, five miles southeast of Winchester, Ind., and belonging to Winchester Quarterly Meeting, has recently been remodeled and modernized, at a cost of almost two thousand dollars. It was re-dedicated the 11th of Eleventh month, Allen Jay being present and delivering the address. Since that time Everett Morgan, of Earlham College, has visited the meeting twice a month.

A correspondent from Bloomingdale, Ind., says that Friends in that meeting always have an appropriate service in commemoration of the establishment of the Hague Court in Fifth month, 1901. They also observe the "World's Peace Sunday," the second first day in Twelfth month. These are worthy of imitation in other meetings, since special times for presenting this cause will keep it fresh in our minds.

Lydia Maxfield Pope, whose obituary we publish this week, was a valuable member of Windham, Me., Monthly Meeting of Friends, serving as clerk, overseer, elder, for many years, and on important committees. For sixty years she was a faithful counsellor and true friend to all—days of usefulness, nights of careful watching at the bedside of sick and dying, years of patient motherliness to homeless and motherless children—are records of her humanitarian and Christian virtues.

A revival began at Rockford, O., the 7th ult., conducted by A. J. Lurstenberger, the pastor, and Isaiah Jay, of Fairmount, Ind. It resulted in 30 additions to the Church. Rockford never before experienced such an awakening. This meeting was launched last Seventh month, and now has over 60 members. A new meeting house has just been completed and dedicated free of debt. Allen Jay was present and delivered an address at the dedicatory exercises the 16th ult.

Pleasant Valley Monthly Meeting was held at Stafford, Kans, the 22nd ult. The name was changed from Pleasant Valley to Stafford. The Quarterly Meeting Superintendent, M. F. Swofford, was present with words of comfort and good cheer. The building committee finished their work and reported all indebtedness paid on the meeting house. Their report was accepted and the committee discharged. J. S. and A. J. Bond write, "We want to thank all those that have assisted us in rebuilding our church."

From The Richmond Sun-Telegram we learn that, "Prof. Harlow Lindley, of Earlham, has been granted a leave of absence from his post as an assistant in the State Library at Indianapolis, and will fill the vacancy caused by the temporary withdrawal of Prof. Cyrus Hodgkin, at Earlham. The latter's illness has necessitated his leaving the college until his recovery is complete. Prof. Lindley resigned his position in the State Library, but it was not accepted, the librarian preferring to grant him an indefinite leave of absence."

At high noon, on the 29th ult., occurred the silver wedding of Jesse C. and Luella Sanders, prominent Friends of Coloma, Monthly Meeting, Bloomingdale Quarter, Ind. Nearly 70 guests assembled under their roof. A bountiful dinner was served. Many beautiful presents were given. After the repast was over, E. K. Morris, the chairman of the company, read a very interesting paper to attentive listeners. The bride and the bridegroom made appropriate remarks, to which quite a number responded. The occasion was one of much interest and profit.

Tennyson Lewis writes from Van Wert, Ohio: "We have just closed a very encouraging and prosperous year. The increase in membership, while it has not been as great in numbers as last year, we feel has been substantial and a real benefit to the Church. The financial condition of the meeting is very good, it having almost double the expense of any previous years. The auxiliaries of the Church, Christian Endeavor, Junior C. E. (the latter organized in last Ninth month, and has a membership of 60), is helpful to the Church. The Ladies' Aid Society pays $100.00 to the support of the pastor, beside a number of other expenses that it maintains. We begin another year with renewed zeal and courage."

The Thirtieth ult. was an interesting day for the Friends in Marshalltown, Iowa. It was a day set apart for re-dedicating the meeting house, now remodeled and enlarged, and, though the day was lowery, it did not conceal the cheerful looking countenances of the members. Ellison R. Purdy, of Oskaloosa, preached morning and evening, delivering helpful, inspiring sermons. At the evening meeting there came, with two exceptions, as per request, fitting responses from all the former pastors who had served in the meeting. A commodious, well-lighted basement is a helpful addition. The enlargement and improvement thus made involved a cost of some $2,500. Now it is hoped the membership may as perseveringly seek to be enlarged numerically and spiritually.

The Friends' Bible School, at Tillson, New York, is in a flourishing condition. Exclusive of the Home Department, of some 20 individuals, who began work with the new year, there are about 70 members enrolled with an average attendance of nearly 60. The school is fortunate in having a most efficient superintendent, who has a sympathetic knowledge of child life and excellent executive ability. The Christmas entertainment, given on the evening of the 24th ult., was an especially attractive one. Several of the most interesting numbers on the program were composed for the occasion by the superintendent. The special aim of two of them was to encourage giving to those in need. The lesson was brought home effectively. The room was beautifully decorated, and the entire program was thoroughly enjoyed.

The missionaries at Gibara, Cuba, have opened up a new station at Bocas, about 12 miles from there. A new branch of the Gibara-Holguin Railroad makes it accessible. A hall has been secured and two meetings held, with an attendance of about 150 each time, and good interest manifested. Bocas is a town of 400 or 500 people, in the midst of a thickly settled, fertile country, which is divided into small farms, most of which are worked by their owners. They are an industrious, prosperous, religious people, and the prospects are good for a good work. Bocas is five miles from Auras, which has been worked from Holguin for almost three years.

The children of the Sabbath Schools of Gibara and Pueblo Nuevo, Cuba, united in an entertainment, given in the Gibara meeting house, on Christmas eve. Under the careful and wise direction of the teacher, Dr. Clotilde L. Pretlow, a nice, suitable program of recitations and songs was prepared, and well rendered. An appreciative audience of about 400 packed the meeting house. A Christmas tree had been prepared, the first in this place, and, with its ornaments and little stockings of candies and nuts for the children who took part, it was quite pretty. While a pine tree could not be secured, a good substitute was found in a mangrove tree. No candles were used, as they are burned here in worship to the saints. About $5.00, American money, was taken in the collection for the poor, and at least one young man, the oldest of 23 children, expressed his determination to attend the meetings.

NEVER TIRES

OF THE FOOD THAT RESTORED HER TO HEALTH.

"My food was killing me and I didn't know the cause," writes a Colorado young lady. "For two years I was thin and sickly, suffering from indigestion and inflammatory rheumatism.

"I had tried different kinds of diet, plain living, and many of the remedies recommended, but got no better.

"Finally, about five weeks ago, mother suggested that I try Grape-Nuts, and I began at once, eating it with a little cream or milk. A change for the better began at once.

"To-day I am well and am gaining weight and strength all the time. I've gained ten pounds in the last five weeks, and do not suffer any more from indigestion and the rheumatism is all gone.

"I know it is to Grape-Nuts alone that I owe my restored health. I still eat the food twice a day and never tire of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The flavor of Grape-Nuts is peculiar to itself. It is neutral, not too sweet, and has an agreeable, healthful quality that never grows tiresome.

One of the sources of rheumatism is from overloading the system with acid material, the result of imperfect digestion and assimilation.

As soon as improper food is abandoned and Grape-Nuts is taken regularly, digestion is made strong, the organs do their work of building up good red blood cells, and of carrying away the excess of disease-making material from the system.

The result is a certain and steady return to normal health and mental activity. "There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

The Famine Relief Work in China is now thoroughly organized. Local committees consisting of missionaries, and aided by prominent Chinese, have the work of distribution thoroughly in hand. We are now informed that food is the only aid acceptable from foreign countries since the Chinese themselves are quite able to provide means to meet the situation. 1,500 bags of American flour have been purchased, and are now on their way. It has been decided to sell provisions at the cheapest rates, except in cases of actual starvation.

A theme now often discussed by our prominent business men is, "Will prosperity last?" During the past century the country has passed through periods of depression, sometimes amounting to a financial crisis, at regular intervals. We are now just beginning a time when another season of hard times is due. This occasions thought on the subject. John D. Rockefeller predicts a serious relapse; Ex-Secretary Shaw warns financiers against over speculation; other men of equal prominence look with apprehension upon the new year, while Carroll D. Wright, Geo. J. Gould, and others, are confident that the present period of prosperity will continue indefinitely.

From the table of statistics, appearing in the current number of the Missionary Review of the World, we learn that American churches have 5,768 missionaries in the foreign field, or about one-third of the total number for Christendom. They expended about $9,000,000, or just a little less than one-half the total amount contributed by the Christian world. Comparatively few unmarried men are missionaries, while 1,536, or a little more than one-fourth of the total number of missionaries, are unmarried women. Two-thirds of the missionaries are married men and their wives. More than 25,000 natives are counted as helpers, and a little over 1,000,000 confess Christianity.

Many flaws in the pure food law, which went into effect on First month 1, are being pointed out by legal experts. For instance, the law provides that whatever is sold as food or drink must be labeled for just what it is, but the law fails to dictate what size type shall be used. It is also defective relative to short-weight cans and jars and short-measure bottles. In consequence, the cans and jars and bottles are of the same old size and the parts of the labels in which the various ingredients are described are printed in type barely distinguishable to the naked eye. A can of alleged French peas is labeled "colored with sulphate of copper." The information, in small type, is printed in copper-colored letters on a copper-colored leaf on the cover of the can.

With the New Year an innovation in the missionary work of the Methodist Episcopal Church will be inaugurated by the creation of the Home Missionary Society as an independent body. Heretofore the home and foreign missionary work has been carried on by one department, and the funds divided according to a rule fixed by the General Conference. But the Church authorities realize the growing importance of the home

DOCTORS ADMIT

THAT THEY CAN DO NOTHING MORE FOR YOUR STOMACH THAN STUART'S
 DYSPESIA TABLETS ARE DOING EVERY DAY.
 COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

According to the expert analysis of government authorities in the United States and Great Britain, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets contain the exact elements provided by nature for digesting food in the healthy stomach.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets have saved sufferers from stomach disorders millions of dollars by giving them, in one small 50 cent package, more relief than countless treatments by physicians would bring about at $3.50 per visit.

Perhaps you are afflicted with dyspepsia—or some kindred disease arising from a disordered digestion. It may be headaches, heartburn, palpitation, liver trouble, insomnia, nervous debility. They all have their beginning in a stomach which does not secrete the juices or grind the food which is taken into it.

If so, we urge you to send for a free trial package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. It will cost you nothing and surely will bring us no gain unless you find, after using it, that you are benefited and feel that you need a full-sized package.

There is absolutely no danger in using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. Nothing is contained in them that has not been subjected to the closest scrutiny by the government officials.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest your food without demanding a careful diet. One grain of these Tablets has power to digest 3,000 grains of ordinary food. You can be sure, therefore, that no matter what your condition, these little tablets taken after each meal will shortly restore your stomach to its normal condition and render it capable of doing its work unassisted.

We withhold the names of hundreds who have written us voluntarily expressing their gratitude to this simple substitute for nature.

Send for trial package to-day. F. A. Stuart Co., 70 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

field, and have decided to carry on a vigorous campaign for the dissemination of Methodism among the thousands of prospective citizens who arrive here daily. According to the plan, the home department will be relatively as important in Church councils as the foreign. It has the backing of the entire Church to raise $1,000,000 to be expended in propagating the gospel in America. To further the project it has been decided to start a new Church paper, which will be issued in Philadelphia. The name of this paper will be the Christian Republic. Its editor will be J. Wesley Johnson.

Some of the ill-effects of the heavy emigration from Italy upon that country are being studied by Italian specialists. It is pointed out that the exodus has become so great, reaching 726,000 in 1905, that whole tracts of country have become depopulated or have gone out of cultivation for lack of laborers. While the emigrants send home millions of money, this has increased alcoholism in Italy, while those who return with their earnings are often physical wrecks because of their privations in unhealthy occupations and climates. Another result of the exodus of the laborers is that women in Italy are more than ever called upon to work in the fields.

Germany begins the new year in the midst of an election campaign involving the most serious crisis which the country has faced since the beginning of modern Germany. The recent Reichstag rejected the Government's colonial budget, believing it to be extravagant. The Emperor promptly dismissed the body and called for a new election. This would not be such a serious thing if the election meant only the choosing of new officers, but in the present situation it amounts almost to a constitutional amendment. At present the power of the Reichstag is limited to the acceptance, rejection or emendation of measures submitted to it by the Imperial Minister, with the consent and approval of the Federal Council. The Government—that is, the Kaiser—and the Federal Council are permanent institutions, but the Reichstag is subject to the will of the Emperor if its rejections and emendations are distasteful to him. What the German people have to decide, therefore, is whether their representatives shall be so in fact, or merely agents for the execution of the will of the Emperor and the Federal Council.

A BANKER'S NERVE

BROKEN BY COFFEE AND RESTORED BY POSTUM.

A banker needs perfect control of the nerves, and a clear, quick, accurate brain. A prominent banker of Chattanooga tells how he keeps himself in condition:

"Up to 17 years of age I was not allowed to drink coffee, but as soon as I got out into the world I began to use it and grew very fond of it. For some years I noticed no bad effects from its use, but in time it began to affect me unfavorably. My hands trembled, the muscles of my face twitched, my mental processes seemed slow, and in other ways my system got out of order. These conditions grew so bad at last that I had to give up coffee altogether.

"My attention having been drawn to Postum Food Coffee, I began its use on leaving off the old kind, and it gives me pleasure to testify to its value. I find it a delicious beverage: like it just as well as I did coffee, and during the years that I have used Postum I have been free from the distressing symptoms that accompanied the use of coffee. The nervousness has entirely disappeared, and I am as steady of hand as a boy of 25, though I am more than 92 years old. I owe all this to Postum Food Coffee." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. All grocers.

IDAHO FRIENDS.

Wish to correspond with Friends seeking homes in the West. We have three Monthly Meetings and Quarterly Meeting, with a rapidly increasing membership. Are in the Boise Valley, have fine climate with mild winters and suited to growth of all tame grasses and grains.

Alfalfa yields five to eight tons per acre in three cuttings per season, and land owned by Friends has yielded seed crop worth $75.10 per acre. Wheat in old lands has made 75 bushels per acre. Apples, peaches, prunes, cherries, pears and all small fruits and vegetables grow to perfection. The sugar beet industry is giving big profits to beet growers. Irrigation is the source of the great prosperity in the valley.

300,000 acres of new lands under Government works, now building. Some fine homestead lands can be secured just now by relinquishment at small cost, but are rapidly advancing. Are in Friends' community, near Caldwell, Boise Valley Quarterly Meeting appointed following committee representing the several sections who write correspondence:

Easiest=Reading Bible

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink running from Genesis to Revelation binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under a mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere Bible reader are brought to light and tied together. In the "International"

Christian Workers' Bible

the Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D. D., the popular authority on Bible themes, has arranged on this plan

Three Thousand Selected Texts

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class but for all who read the Scriptures.

Prominent people's opinions of the Christian Workers' Bible:

JOHN WANAMAKER: I have received the marvelously beautiful and complete work—"International Christian Workers' Bible." It is an advance of anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable for Christian Workers.

LYMAN ABBOTT: This edition will be valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible on great spiritual themes directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries and theological treatises.

REV. JAMES A. WORDEN, D. D., LL. D., Supt. Sabbath-School Training, Presbyterian Board of Sunday-School Work: In this beautiful "International" Christian Workers' Bible, a specimen of the finest typography, I have a complete copy of the Scriptures accurately and tastefully marked, according to the very best ideas of Bible marking.

Dr. Hurlbut has been especially happy in deciding upon these passages which treat of the theme of salvation, and upon his division of this sacred theme into classes. I went through the Christian Workers' Bible twice, the accuracy of the classification, and I found it complete in every instance.

These beautiful printed red lines and letters are guides to the great themes of the Bible. This volume must prove a treasure to all Sabbath-school teachers, to all Y. M. C. A. members, and also to the members of the Forward League or Christian Endeavor, and, indeed, to all Bible readers.

C. B. BLACKALL, Editor of Periodicals, American Baptist Pub'n Society: It seems to me this Bible is indispensable. It seems to be lacking in nothing either mechanical or otherwise as a practical aid.

The Christian Workers' Bible is bound in fine Morocco, Divinity Circuit, with overlapping edges; round corners, gold edges with red underneath. Size of page, 8 1/2 x 5 1/4 inches, beautifully printed in large, clear type on extra fine paper.

The Christian Workers' Bible will be SENT FREE for examination, all charges prepaid.

What Shall We do To-day?

O, the deeds we will do in the days to come,
And the words we mean to say
Will enliven the hearts of the sun and soul;
But what shall we do to-day?

O, the burdens we'll lift from the hearts of men,
O the tears we will wipe away
And the songs we will sing to the faltering ones;
But what shall we do to-day?

To-day is the span of our life, no more;
Can we measure, or clasp, or mould,
There may be no morrow for us dear heart,
No future to use or hold.

O, let us give our store at dawn,
Give till the gleaming fades away
All we may do for the sons of men,
Is the good we can do to-day.

A History of the Friends in America

By ALLEN C. and RICHARD H. THOMAS

This work, revised by Allen C. Thomas, sketches with skill the early settlements of Friends in America, their sufferings, growth, labors and migrations. The accounts of the separations are impartial, and the subsequent history of the different branches is given separately. An entirely new chapter on the "Latest Years" has been added, bringing the work up-to-date. Few histories have been written with more care, and few have more useful information, clearly stated in less space.

"A work . . . which is likely for many days to be a standard text-book on the subject."—The London Friend.

SPEAKING WITH TONGUES.

Reports are coming in of the appearance, both in Ohio and California, of the gift of tongues. So far as we know this is the first time such a gift has appeared among Friends, and we have been asked what the significance of the event really is. The newspaper accounts, which are probably not very trustworthy, say that, in one case, a Friend has suddenly acquired the power to speak five different languages—all of them unlike any known language, and that one of his associates has a similar power of speaking three. The newspaper report goes on to add that the possessors of the gift hope to travel until they find tribes or peoples who will understand these unknown tongues, so that they can be used for missionary purposes.

Our readers ought to be told, if they do not know it already, that cases of power to speak in unknown languages quite often appear, and that they have appeared in all centuries, and probably among almost all peoples. There have been some very striking cases of the "power" in our own time, and they have been carefully studied by competent persons. The most famous case of recent times, is that of "Hélène Smith," of Geneva, whose case is reported at length in Professor Flournoy's book, "From India to the Planet Mars." Hélène Smith in trance believed that she visited the planet Mars, and reported much of its scenery and characteristics. Finally, one day while in trance, she began to speak in an unknown language, which she declared was the language spoken on the planet Mars. Her power to speak the language of Mars continued and developed until she produced a fairly well-formed, distinct dialect, though a careful study of it revealed the fact that in structure it was modeled on the general lines of her native French. It was, however, as she wrote and spoke it, no language known to earth. Other similar cases have been investigated where a pretty well-formed language was produced. But more often the "speaker in tongues" utters a string of unintelligible sounds—ejaculations which flow from him without conveying any meaning to him or to those who hear him. In all such cases the speaking is automatic, wholly beyond the control of the will. The person feels himself seized, or possessed, and his lips speak without any will of his own. Automatic writing is very much more common than automatic speaking, and cases of the latter come under observation almost every day.

All such manifestations are varieties, in different degrees, of "double personality." One part of the self becomes dissociated from the organized and unified, normal, personality, and this dissociated part uses the hands or lips. The real self is, for time being, "submerged," i. e., in trance, and an intruding self comes to the front. Certain forms of this state can be found in any spiritualistic medium, who is not a fraud.

The state, however, has no religious, or spiritual significance. It is abnormal. It indicates disease rather than health. It is no convincing sign of spiritual power. It is no more religious than a headache is. Nor again is it miraculous or supernatural. It is as natural as dreams, or somnambulism. It may be produced by almost any powerful excitement which throws the normal emotional machinery out of gear. In fact, hysteria is always the beginning of some form of double personality and the worst thing one can do for it is to feed it on emotional excitement. The manifestation is almost always "contagious," as most forms of hysteria are, that is to say, it spreads by suggestion, and if there is one case there are almost sure to be more.

How wise was that inspired apostle who said, that the true mark of spiritual power is no extraordinary phenomenon, but just love; for if one speak with the tongue of angels, and have not love, he utters empty noise, and who added "I had rather speak five words intelligently than ten thousand in an unknown tongue."

R. M. J.

FACING THE RIGHT WAY.

We are told of a lonely Hebrew who opened his windows toward Jerusalem three times a day, and with his people, though in exile, worshipped with their faces toward the Holy City. These may seem like trifles, but they are not, for, after all, it does make a difference which way we face, and we are encouraged as we contemplate the new year by the thought that many Friends are turning their faces in the right direction. Part of their interest is in the past as it should be. More history classes than ever before are being organized. Two were recently reported from Baltimore and Washington. New England and Kansas have entered the list with fresh recruits, while the yearly meetings in the Middle West and London report advances. These backward looks are only for the purpose of determining our position and the direction of our advance. We face in another direction.

A recent number of The (London) Friend was devoted to a forward look. The articles were encouraging, indeed, not so much because of what our Friends have already attained, but because they are looking in the right direction. Extension is written large on every page. The hopeful spirit of advance breathes throughout. "It is tolerably certain that the next ten years will see the opening of 1,000 new (adult) schools," says a writer on that subject, and he follows with reasons for believing that his prophesy will be fulfilled. The spirit of the movement is well expressed by W. C. Braithwaite, "We shall extend not by our limitations, but by our life, not by our exclusiveness, but by our love. Accordingly the expansion of the Quaker fellowship depends fundamentally upon our success, as individuals and as congregations, in living the life of fellowship. We are beginning to understand this, and in consequence the future is aglow with hope."

The desire to extend our life is not new; it is a prominent aspect of our early history, and has always been more or less potent. Especially is this true of the revival in our newer meetings. But the "revival movement" borrowed methods and ideals from other Protestants sometimes not consistent with our own. This fact complicates the present situation and adds interest to the outcome of the new movement. Nevertheless, the future is big with hope. The adult school is modern Quakerism at work in its most consistent form. It is full of life, and calls for consecration and constant endeavor. Its spirit encourages honest inquiry and fosters real hunger for righteousness. Its freedom brings a wide range of talent into use. To quote the words of Edwin Gilbert, "The principles for which Friends stand are being most surely and most firmly established."

To some it may seem like a waste of time to dwell so much upon our history, and there is a danger in this direction if it is taken as an end in itself, but to those with eyes to see, and ears to hear, it is a rich source of inspiration. Nor should we belittle thorough preparation for careful advance. We should know ourselves and our message; we should know our fellow men and how to minister to their needs. Much can be lost in every way by lack of knowledge. The demand of the hour is for laborers thoroughly equipped. Nor will it suffice to borrow methods from other denominations because they bring a measure of success. We should do more. The world is hungry for a fuller spiritual message than is now found in the average church. People are asking for an interpretation of Christianity which will minister to ordinary men every day in the year, and we should "study" to make the most of this situation. To quote again from W. C. Braithwaite: "Let the fellowship be simple and spiritual and brotherly. Maintain in it the glow of spiritual fellowship with God, and the warmth of brotherly service to man, and let these life-giving forces find their own natural expression in arrangements and organization."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

PRAYER.

BY AUGUSTUS T. MURRAY.

Apart from the Master's example and the prayer which He taught His disciples, the passages in the New Testament which seem most instructive and illuminating with regard to prayer are the following:

"And all things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Matt. 21:22.

"If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." John 15:7.

"Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss that ye may consume it upon your lusts." James 4:3.

Of these passages the first gives what must seem to every thoughtful person one of the most astounding promises that could be imagined. Taken by itself it appears to mean that faith is the only thing that conditions the granting of any prayer that man may offer. There is nothing in the context that suggests other conditions,—no thought of holiness on the part of him who prays, no implication that the prayer must be in harmony with the divine will, no suggestion that God acts by law and not by caprice. The disciples had been amazed at the sudden withering of the fig tree, and our Lord took the occasion to tell them that, if they had faith, they could do even greater things;—they might say to the mountain, "Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea," and it should be done.

Taken by itself, I say, this passage is beyond our comprehension. It well illustrates the danger of basing theories, whether of doctrine or of conduct, on isolated passages of Scripture. This is, perhaps, particularly true of the words of our Lord, which have come down to us in such scattered fragments. A "hard saying" often finds its true explanation only in the light of other sayings, recorded in other passages; and it is precisely so in this case. The quotation from John gives us the added light which we need,—the further condition without which mere faith is unavailing. "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." So, too, the passage from James gives another side of the same truth. If we do not abide in Him, and seek to know and to do His will, we "ask and receive not, because we ask amiss."

This matter of prayer is one to which thinking people must, of necessity, turn. This is an age of thought. Vital questions are not to be put aside with vague and general answers. We must face facts; we must seek to know, not to assume; and we must stand upon something firmer than tradition. Now the question, Why should I pray? is one of these vital ones; and upon the attitude we assume toward it our spiritual life in no small measure depends.

It is a commonplace that, as we grow older, our point of vision shifts, and we outgrow our former attitudes of thought and feeling. Truth remains the same, but we see it in a different perspective as the years go on; and it is but natural that we come to look back on what was at one time real to us with a feeling of wonder that it could have been so. This is truer, perhaps, in our religious lives than anywhere else. We cannot pour the new wine of our enlarged intellectual and spiritual experiences into the old bottles of the habits of thought and expression which once satisfied us, or which we received from others without any thought as to whether they satisfied us or not. But if the new attitude betokens a clearer vision of truth, can it be aught but an advance?

There is, it is true, a danger,—the danger of following false guides, of mistaking semblance for reality, falsehood for truth, wrong for right. Some men have felt their faith in immortality slipping from them; but if they have, therefore, said, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," they have sinned against their own manhood. So, too, have those, who in an over-confidence in their own clearer vision, their fancied emancipation, would fain set themselves above the God-given principles of right living. He, who knew whereof He spake, taught that the pure in heart, and they alone, should see God. But in the case of him who strives not only to follow the light, but to do the right as well, the change from the attitude of mind which characterizes the child brought up under Christian influences to that which marks the grown man, need not be dreaded. Some would perhaps, say that he has given up much which might have been a source of infinite comfort to him. But our chief business in life is not to seek comfort, but to seek truth; and it is not a source of comfort to have your thinking done for you. It is a source of weakness and a mark of weakness. No; he has but grown to the stature of manhood; and he may retain all the simplicity and all the lowliness of a child, a far greater sense of need, and an equally vital faith; but he faces life for himself, and may at times feel weighed down by its mystery.

In no phase of our religious lives is this change of attitude more marked than in regard to prayer. Nor is this strange. The child kneels at his mother's side and voices each childish wish, using phrases which only gradually come to have any real meaning to him. His childlike trust in the efficacy of prayer is very beautiful; but he is far more apt to pray for good weather on a given holiday than for spiritual blessings. To him, prayer is the asking for what he wants, and all besides the actual petition is mere formula. But, by and by, when he is old enough to think for himself, and, by his training, is led to do so, he finds it impossible to use the prayers that formerly satisfied him, or to make the same petitions. His sense of need is not less, but vastly greater; his sense of the power, and, it may be, of the love of God is also greater; but he cannot pray as he used to. "Now that I am become a man," said Paul, "I have put away childish things;" and a sad result which sometimes follows the change from childhood to manhood is that all prayer is a childish thing.

For the universe is not governed by an arbitrary potentate who acts at random and from caprice. This is, of course, the old pagan view. There was a time when men's thoughts went no further than that, and it was then as natural for them to turn to God with their petty needs and desires, hoping, by their prayers, to alter His will or to deflect it from its apparent course, as to seek to buy His favor by sacrifice and offerings,—to strike a bargain, as it were, with the Almighty. This latter conception is not yet dead, but no thoughtful person can for a moment entertain it. It is little short of blasphemous. So, too, we must say that the arbitrary exercise of power by the ruler of the universe, who is moved thus to act by the petition of a mortal, is inconceivable; that the conception of caprice as the mainspring of divine action has been relegated to the lumber-room of outworn beliefs. One of the greatest, perhaps the very greatest, achievement of our modern age has been the discovery, or shall we say the demonstration, that God works by law. Everywhere, and in every field, the law of causation is paramount; and every atom in the universe has its due influence upon every other. "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father," are words that have won a richer and fuller meaning in the light of modern thought. Science has wrested from nature many of her secrets, and has learned something of her laws; and the laws of nature are the laws of God,—immutable and inexorable, not to be broken by God Himself. When, then, it is asked, should men pray, or what use has prayer?

Yet it remains true that men do pray, and that the wise and the great among men pray not less, but more. For here, as so often, it is seen that those who look up, though it be but dimly, not to abstract cosmic force, not to an infinite One, unknowable and unthinkable, but to Him who, while He is "the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth," is also our Father,—to those who correlate what they learn of God in the laboratory with what they learn of Him in human history, and whose ears are open to the still small voice, which speaks to the heart above the din of the whirlwind, the earthquake, and the fire, a larger and deeper view is possible.

This is not to say that caprice has, after all, a place in the government of the world, that the will of the Almighty may be turned, and the effects of natural causes thwarted at will by human prayers. That, besides being impossible in the light of God's revelation of Himself in the laws of the natural world, would presuppose a world in which man's life could not endure. If causes were not to produce their due results; if heat, for example, were not to cause water to boil or ice to thaw; if the forces of the spring were not to cause vegetation to grow; or if these things were not certain results, but dependent on mere chance, how could life go on? Rigid, inflexible law it is that makes life possible. "While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease," was the promise to Noah; and what is true of the greater is true also of the lesser.

In what I have already said, I have gone too far for some and not far enough for others; but I think that we shall approach common ground if, leaving behind us the cruder conception of prayer as the preferment of our petitions and this alone, we think of it as primarily an act of worship. It is a conscious and purposed effort on our part to draw near to God. We bow before Him in lowliness and godly fear, and seek to commune with Him. The things of sense fade away; we lose our consciousness of the presence or the absence of others; we are alone with God in His holy place,—in the holy of holies where His presence is manifested. Have you and I not seen in the faces of those whose souls are uplifted in prayer a light and a beauty as of an angel? Have we not felt that they are indeed in the very presence of God?

Such is the genuine prayer; and is not this the very essence of worship? Men are too prone to think that worship is something outward and formal; that it consists in the observance of certain conventional or traditional rules regarding their assembling together on the first day of the week, giving up an hour of their time to listen to a man whose business it is to speak to them, and contributing some small portion of their means to the support of a church. Yet how vain all this is, and how clear has been the Quaker testimony regarding such views in time past! True worship, though it be in a vast congregation, is an individual act. The soul must feel itself in the presence of God, and must bow before Him. Neither in the grandest cathedral, whose Gothic arches may of themselves seem to draw men's thoughts upwards, and amid all the accompaniments of music and eloquence, nor in the simple quiet of a Friends' meeting can one man worship for another. The most that outward beauty, or music, or the spoken word, or silence, can do is to stimulate the attitude of mind in which men become conscious that they are, indeed, in the presence of Him "in whom we live and move and have our being," "Who is above all, and in all, and through you all."

This is a truth often lost sight of even among Friends, whose spiritual inheritance, if they would but enter into it, is so much larger, so much deeper. We have all seen meetings which are classed among the weak ones, the members of which seem to have no clear sense that they are in any way responsible for the lack of power and vital spiritual life in their meetings. They think, it would appear, that to bring someone in to preach to them, or, to put it bluntly, to do their worshipping for them, is a cure for all their ills; but how vain and futile this is! What is needed among us is that each member of each meeting should come to realize that unless his own spiritual life is vital, he is himself an obstacle preventing the development of the spiritual life of the meeting; that unless he goes into meeting to worship, the meeting cannot be rich and fraught with blessing to him, while if he does this,—if he meets with God and communes with Him, nothing can prevent the hour from being one of blessing.

Once a man realizes this truth and withdraws from the worries and the cares, the hopes and the disappointments of life, to listen to the divine message and in very truth to commune with God, he worships: and is not that the very attitude of prayer? For to utter formal words of prayer is nothing; merely to ask for what we want is nothing, and may be worse than nothing; but humbly to bow before God with the heartfelt prayer that the path of duty may be made clear, and that strength may be given us to walk in that path unflinchingly is much—ininitely much.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF OUR MEETINGS FOR WORSHIP.

BY MARY SNOWDEN BRAITHWAITE.

We live in a day of investigation, and it is to be expected that the search-light that is falling upon almost everything else that we have inherited, will be turned also upon our form of worship. It had its place once; is it the best we can do now? Meetings for worship were to the early fathers of our Society a refuge from the dry and wearisome services of the churches of the day. They were opportunities for soul refreshment, times of looking to the Lord and being taught of His Spirit. They met a want felt strongly by the earnest seekers after God of that generation. Gradually some of the life that was so manifested in them ebbed away. They lost the fervid spiritual power which springs from deep experience of the things of God. The attending of the meetings became a matter of habit. Friends too often went to them without the sense of expectation so necessary to the realization of the Divine presence. And so it came about that the state of many meetings gave occasion to the remark, "The dearest of all dead things is a dried-up Quaker meeting." But all the meetings were not dead. Many in each generation of our Society have been instinct with life, full of blessing and power. They have had a large share in building up strong, earnest and faithful characters.

In the "forward movement," now so happily manifest among us, what is the place and function of our meetings for worship? Or, are we to join hands with those who doubt whether they have any place at all? Friends now-a-days are agreed in dropping the notion, prevalent in the middle ages of our Society, that no other form of meeting of a religious character is desirable or even allowable. We recognize the value, for their special purposes, of Bible-classes, or lectures on theological subjects, or on Church history, of mission meetings and Adult Schools. Are we, then, to drop the meetings for worship, or to try to modify them so that they may do the work of meetings of another sort, for which they were not designed? This would be like harnessing a race-horse to a plough, or trying to "cut blocks with a razor." We may spoil our meeting for worship and not do the desired work efficiently in the end. If we try to turn these meetings into mission meetings, or teaching meetings, or arranged meetings of any kind, we run a great risk of destroying their special characteristics, without making them more than poor imitations of something that they were never fitted to be. There is room in our economy for many varieties of meetings, and the different kinds should be encouraged as need arises for them, but let us keep our meetings for worship on their original lines, as open meetings, depending on the direction of the Lord, and free from outward arrangement.

It is a practical necessity that such a meeting must be held on the basis of silence—not as an end in itself, but as a means to an end. There must be silence that the Lord may speak first, that no pre-arranged speaking by one appointed for the purpose may stand in the way of the Lord's message sent by some other brother or sister; that words of prayer may not be uttered merely because the set time has come, but only because the Spirit of the Lord has awakened desires which call for vocal expression. There must be silence as a basis, the means to an end; and what is known and felt in the silence is often the best part of the meeting, and the lack of silence would be a great loss.

Many of us have known, when becalmed in a town with no Friends' meeting, the feeling of breathlessness that comes over one in a service where an anthem is followed by prayer, and prayer by hymn, and hymn by reading, and reading by hymn, and hymn by prayer, and prayer by hymn, and hymn by notices, and notices by sermon, and sermon by hymn, and hymn by collections (to music), and music by benediction; a breathlessness only to be lost in the precious three minutes of silence at the end. A little girl who was taken for the first time to a Church service, exclaimed in the middle of the Litany, "Father, won't God be angry if Mr.—— keeps teasing Him so?" She had evidently a dim perception of the mistake of the repetition of even a good thing. From arrangements of this sort in our meetings for worship, some of us would fervently say, in the words of the Litany, "Good Lord, deliver us!" We should lose immeasurably if the calm and inspiration of our silent times of waiting on the Lord as a congregation were taken from us. Out of such living silence praise and thanksgiving rise from many hearts, and vocal expressions of different kinds will find their fitting setting in the silence that precedes and follows.

We who are Friends have learned to value our meetings for worship, and would not be deprived of them. It may be that in some meetings we have experienced times of such exceptional blessing that they live in our memory as the ideal to which we believe all meetings might be made to conform. We know something of the possibilities, and meetings which fall lamentably short of the ideal do not cause us to lose our faith in the method which at other times has allowed such happy results. But it may well be otherwise with those who have been attracted by the writings of Friends, by personal influence in Adult Schools, or by hearing addresses which have interested them in Friends' views, and their position on great public questions. If one of these, wishing to try the experiment of attending a Friends' meeting, should unhappily light upon one of the "dried-up" type, his attraction to the Society would not be greatly increased. If, unfortunately, the same experience should be repeated—not an absolute impossibility—he would hardly be likely to become a regular attender of our meetings. It is clear that if our meetings for worship are to take their right place in the "forward movement," they must always be of the ideal kind, and we must never be satisfied with anything less than this. This does not mean that all meetings for worship should be exactly alike, indeed if they were under right direction, they would be as different from one another as the flowers in our gardens. Whether the keynote of the meeting was prayer or praise, warning or encouragement, humiliation or joy, loving dwelling on the Lord Jesus Christ, His life and work, or a sympathetic outlook on the needs of the world around us, or any one of the thousand subjects which the Spirit of the Lord might lay on the hearts of any, all would be so manifestly in the power and love of Christ that everyone would go away feeling that the meeting had, indeed, been not merely with one another, but with the Lord.

But how is this to be brought about? How are our meetings, some of which are so arid, to be made to "rejoice" and to "blossom as the rose"? In considering how to answer this question, it must be remembered that a meeting for worship is not designed to attract all sorts and conditions of men. This is far from being the case. In the early days of Quakerism it was the concerned people, the thoughtful men and women who already had knowledge of the things of God who came to it, and so it will continue to be while it maintains its character. It is not so much a meeting for "the propagation of the Gospel in the district" as for the training and uplifting into higher spiritual knowledge, those who shall carry the message of God's love to others. The word for those still walking in darkness will not be lacking, but the burden of the messages will probably be for those who already know the Lord. In such a meeting, in which a large proportion of those in attendance in various stages of Christian experience are looking for and receiving their teaching directly from the Lord, there will be a great variety of vocal service, and there ought to be perfect freedom for the simplest expressions of praise or prayer or exhortation. These are often of very great help, and the meetings would lose immeasurably if they were withheld. There is, however, need also for the service of those to whom the Lord has given a definite call to the ministry, and upon whose hearts He has laid a special concern for these meetings, and to those must come the word, "Take heed to the ministry that thou hast received in the Lord that thou fulfill it."

The right fulfilment of this ministry is a matter of the highest moment. It is to be of service amongst those who are themselves to help and influence others. It is to lead the leaders, to give encouragement to the pioneers as well as to support the weak and comfort the feeble-minded. In these days, when religious literature abounds, if the truth is to be declared in a way to arrest attention in such a meeting, the preaching and teaching will require some knowledge, both of the thoughts of men to-day and of the history of the Church in the past, and of the lives of saints in all ages, as well as continual loving study of the Bible, and, above all, a deep and overflowing spiritual power. Those who feel specially called to work in our meetings for worship will have to recognize these things, and give themselves to be used of the Lord in this way.

It is here that we are brought face to face with the real difficulty. Are we willing to take the necessary trouble to make our meetings for worship what they should be, and what they would be if we counted the cost and were willing to pay it? How much thought do we give to these meetings? How much prayer? How do we value spiritual power? What price will we really give for it? Do we choose it if it would cost us some ease, or interfere with our quiet, comfortable life? Do we wish to go just so far as is quite convenient, but no further? Heat a bar of iron to a certain extent and there is no change in its appearance, subject it to a greater heat and it begins to glow; made hotter still, it sets on fire everything it touches. Such, says Arthur, in "The Tongue of Fire," are the successive stages when a man receives and comes under the influence of, and is filled with, the Spirit of God. Our meetings for worship will only produce their full effect where the concerned members are so hot that they can set others on fire. The fire that we ought to be filled with, and to kindle in others, does not mean effervescing excitement, but it means a steady enthusiasm that comes from the presence of the Lord in the power of His love; an enthusiasm that cannot be damped, and knows no discouragement; a glow that is manifest in all that is said and done; an expectation of God's working; an assurance of His ultimate victory over all the forces of evil; a Christlike love that goes after that which is lost until it is found.

If the well-concerned members of a meeting, in this spirit, or desiring and longing to be in it, would begin before each Sunday was over to think about and pray for the meeting on the following Sunday, there would soon be a difference in the atmosphere of the meeting. The thought and prayer would soon become, not vague and general, but special and particular. Probably, such concerned members would soon feel drawn to meet with others of like concern, possibly even every week. Such a weekly meeting might be somewhat like a meeting of the directors of a large business. There would be the wide outlook, as well as the attention to detail. In a spirit of hope, the needs of the meeting would be the gone into, the character of the preaching discussed, whether it was pointed and straight to the mark, or like the shooting of the Kilmarnock volunteer, who had six targets before him and missed "the hale raw." The spiritual temperature of the meeting would be considered, and the kind of people who were attending and their special needs. The sort of exposition that had been given, or the lack of expository teaching, would be commented upon. When the needs had been gone over, there would certainly follow a time of waiting on the Lord, to know His mind in the matters discussed; a time of receiving of His fulness, as hearts were bowed in a deep sense of personal need, and in eager longing to be used in whatever way He might choose.

It is not unlikely that at such conferences a concern would arise in the heart of someone, to bring before a Sunday morning meeting some special subject. This could be considered by the others and united with or not, as the mind of the Lord was known in the matter. Sometimes, perhaps, the judgment of the united company might be the means of conveying the Lord's call to one of their number as to some special form of service required. Thus, individually, and in company the concerned members of the meeting might wait on the Lord for His direction, and for the constantly renewed filling with His Spirit, and in His light, the messages to be delivered at various times might become clear, so that forecasts might be made of the concern of particular meetings; forecasts to be realized only as the way opened at the time, and to cause no disappointment if the Lord had some other and better thing in store.

Meetings held after such preparation of heart, in a spirit of earnest faith and expectation, would fill an important place in the extension work of Friends. They would be the Central Fire, where enthusiasm is kindled for fighting the forces of evil arrayed against the Kingdom of God,—the Tool-Sharpening Machine, where each worker is prepared for his own bit of work. The Adult and Sunday School teacher, the mission worker, the social reformer, the sick visitor, and many more besides would be drawn to such meetings, would find their own needs supplied, and go away with renewed enthusiasm, fresh love, greater power to help, and more insight into the right way of using their knowledge of Divine things.

Some Views on Present Day Topics.

THE FRONT PEW.

BY E. B. MENDENHALL.

Having thoughtfully noticed, for more than half a decade, the apparent dread which the average church member has of the front pew, I have been made to wonder what has happened—what has befallen it—the said front pew. Let me go back three-score and ten years—to the days of wooden benches.

I remember quite well that the front pews, when “meetin’ time” came, were the first to be filled.

Indeed, the religious value—the religious weight—of a member was measured by the seat he occupied.

In those days the body of the meeting would be seen gathered about the “gallery seats.” The venerable Friend loved to be near the preacher, as if his nearness lent a helping inspiration to him, and evidenced his unity and fellowship.

Even the politician, when delivering a “stump speech” for his party, if a Democrat, would have nearest to him his most sanguine followers to clap approval of the salient principles of his party; and vice versa, if a Whig. Always, the persons in opposition stand at long range—just in hearing distance.

To-day, curiously, things are different. I do not know how nearly universal, but quite generally, I have reason to believe, church members diligently seek back pews. Even local ministers, where there is a pastor, complacently take the backmost seat. I wonder what it means.

We know when one comes into meeting and does not want to enter into the service—the spirit and weight of the meeting—he almost instinctively drops into a seat at the rear, or to one side of the room.

And we know, too, that, generally, the unsaved and the non-church member wants precisely the same place—just as far back as the walls will allow. Crowd him to the front pew, and he will feel ill at ease.

I know that in many of our houses for worship, as they are now arranged, the penitent form—the “mourner’s bench”—is located just in front of the pulpit, and, therefore, the unregenerate man, determined to remain in that state, not only wants to avoid that bench, but even nearness to it; and on the other hand, the nominal Christian avoids the same place, thinking that he is possessed of too much humility to approach such a sacred place as the pulpit and mourner’s bench. And, again, I sometimes wonder whether it helps the dear preacher most to have his congregation scattered off yonder in groups, at long range, or to have them in an easy, sympathetic, fellowship distance. I once asked a minister—a good minister, too, if, upon reaching a place where he had previously announced a meeting with his enthusiasm up to about sixty, he should find his congregation already assembled, gathered in knots, and scattered here and there in far-away pews, where would his enthusiasm then stand? “In less than two minutes it would be down to about forty,” was his reply.

I wonder if this would not be the answer of every minister the country over.

A few years ago, a lady evangelist, a Methodist woman of excellent ability, held a revival meeting in our city. For two weeks she labored earnestly. Her meetings, of course, were held in the M. E. church edifice, capable of seating hundreds of people. The issue was almost nothing, and I wondered if the distance from the pulpit over and across so many empty pews to the front edge of her congregation was so great that her words, on reaching the people had lost their edge and warmth. It is sometimes hard to bring forward and concentrate a congregation. But is it so when the hearts of people are melted together in joyous fellowship one with another and with the minister? I believe, with these conditions present, a meeting—personally, and, as a whole,—would blessedly help the minister to lift up Christ, who said of Himself, “And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.”

I like to think often of a large—a very large—meeting at Capernaum. There was no room—no empty space between the speaker and the audience; so when the four, bringing one sick of the palsy, being a little late, found near access to the Divine Minister impossible, they went aloft and let down from above, right at the feet of Jesus, as if personal nearness, personal touch, would make sure his healing. Years later another meeting was held about which I like to linger—a meeting by Paul’s appointment held at Miletus. He and his beloved Ephesian converts were there. The meeting was convened—I think it was a small meeting—held even in the open-air, and yet, at the close of the closing prayer, the people, his beloved Ephesians, were so close to him that they could put their arms around him—yes, could even kiss him. I wonder if this heart-to-heart touch did not give Paul inspiration—courage to go heroically on to “accomplish my course,” though the Holy Ghost did testify in every city—“bonds and afflictions abide me.” No, Paul had no need to leap from his pulpit and run to be able to shake hands with those fellows before they got away, over yonder near the door, or in the outer circle of the audience.

Briefly, I pity—yes, I do—our dear pastors—preachers—who have to hurl the Gospel over and across empty front pews to a congregation scattered around in the remote corners and back seats.

Third-day, First mo. 22.—Acceptable sacrifice. Ps. 51: 10-19.

Fourth-day, First mo. 23.—By faith. Heb. 11: 1-6.

First-day, First mo. 27.—Blood of sprinkling. Heb. 12: 18-26.

Time.—Unknown.

Place.—Probably in the district called Eden, but outside the Garden.

It is quite clear that the present lesson does not contain anything but a single incident and its consequences. Much is omitted. Cain and Abel are grown up, agriculture and a pastoral life are taken for granted. Nothing is said about the origin of sacrifice; a population on the earth is assumed (verse 14), or who would there be for Cain to fear, and also a custom of blood revenge is presupposed (verses 14, 15). While much history is passed over, and the extent of the author's knowledge is uncertain, the religious teaching of the story is clear, forcible, and in complete accordance with human nature as we know it.

3. "In process of time." An indefinite period. "Cain." Various meanings of the word have been given, none entirely satisfactory. "Brought of the fruit of the ground." "First fruits" were a common offering. Compare Ex. 22: 29, 30. All nations have made offerings to a deity—sometimes, and in the most savage tribes, to appease an offended god, or to propitiate a god, who it was feared might be angry; sometimes as a thanks offering for blessings received. Here the offerings appear to be spontaneous, and hence thank-offerings.

4. "Firstlings of his flock." Whether this means the first born (Ex. 13: 12), or the best, cannot be determined. "The fat." The fat pieces, certain of which were highly esteemed, and hence fit for an offering, (Numbers 18: 17). "The Lord had respect unto Abel, and to his offering." How this was manifested is not told, but it is clear that both Cain and Abel understood.

5. "Cain was very wroth." A true touch of human nature. "Fell." His countenance showed his feelings. Compare Job 29: 24. The question naturally arises, why was one offering accepted, and the other rejected, when each was intended as an evidence of thankfulness? The answer must be inferred, and it can only be that there was a difference in the spirit and temper of the brothers. In other words, it was not the gift, but the spirit in which the gift was offered, that made the offering acceptable. Heb. 11: 4; 1 Jno. 3: 12; Jude 11; Isa. 1: 11-13; Mat. 1: 13. What was wrong in Cain is not told—it might have been envy of his brother, it might have been something inconsistent with a righteous offering, but whatever it was, it was enough to vitiate the sacrifice. Compare Ps. 4: 5; 1 John 3: 12.

6, 7. "If thou doest well, shall it not be lifted up?" Amer. R. V. If thou doest well thy countenance shall be bright and lifted up showing that thy spirit is right. "And if thou doest not well, sin coucheth at the door." Amer. R. V. If thy heart is not right, if thy desires are evil, then sin, like a leopard, is ready to leap upon thee. "And unto thee shall be its desire." Amer. R. V. Sin will be eager to attack thee. "But do thou rule over it." Amer. R. V. Have self-control, conquer the temptation, before it is too much for thee. This seems to be the last rendering and explanation of this somewhat difficult verse. It is a graphic statement of the great danger there is in harboring evil thoughts or "sullen and unreasoning discontent."

8. The idea in this verse is that Cain, regardless of the warning he had received, asks Abel to go with him into a solitary place, where there would be none to interfere, and there, from envy, he slew him. The verse, as it stands, seems incomplete. Some versions read, "And Cain said unto Abel, his brother, Let us go into the field," etc.

9. How Cain was spoken to is not related. Note the difference between the answers of Adam and Eve, and that of Cain. The former only excuse themselves, and admit their guilt; Cain says falsely that he knows not where his brother is, and adds to his falsehood by asking a question which implies that he has no obligation in regard to his brother. "Am I my brother's keeper." Many a man has asked that question since, either directly, or indirectly. That we are our brother's keeper is a fact that cannot be evaded. We are responsible for the wrong that we can prevent, and do not prevent. What would be thought of a man who could save another from drowning, and did not? Is it not equally true in the moral world? This is what Paul meant when he said, "Lest I make my brother to stumble."

10. The murder could not be hidden. "Blood wrongfully shed was regarded as crying to God for vengeance." Compare Job 16: 18; Ezek. 24: 7.

11. "Ground," seems to mean the cultivated ground in distinction to that which is wild. Cain is driven out of the bounds of Eden (verse 16). The sentence is pronounced.

12. The particulars of the curse,—His chosen occupation shall fail him, and a guilty conscience will make him wander from place to place.

13. Cain is alarmed, though no signs of true penitence are described. He shrank from the punishment, and thought more of that than of seeking pardon.

14. Cain is still in the district of Eden, and if he is driven out he will be away from the protection of God. Even the old Hebrews believed that each country had its own protecting deity, and as God was supposed to dwell in Eden, to leave it was too lose Him. At any rate, that he would be far from God's dwelling place. "Shall slay me." He believed that anyone would have the right to revenge Abel's murder—that the blood-avenger would dog his steps.

15. "Therefore," etc. Cain receives an assurance that the blood-avenger shall not hurt him, but otherwise the sentence is unaltered. There was some justice in his complaint. "Set a mark." "Sign." R. V. What this was, it is impossible to say. A visible mark, which would identify him, would seem a doubtful benefit, and yet the inference from the narrative indicates an outward mark of some kind.

TOPIC FOR FIRST MONTH TWENTY-SEVENTH, 1907.

HOME MISSIONS: THE PROGRESS OF THE INDIANS.

Isa. 43: 16-21.

Second-day, First mo. 21.—Aborigines. Josh. 13: 1-13.
 Third-day, First mo. 22.—Their religion false. Ezra 9: 10-15.
 Fourth-day, First mo. 23.—Not to be robbed. Ezek. 47: 22, 23.
 Fifth-day, First mo. 24.—Showing kindness. Judg. 4: 11, 12.
 Sixth-day, First mo. 25.—Fair treatment. Deut. 2: 1-9.
 Seventh-day, First mo. 26.—Christ's neighbors. John 4: 7-30.

The first missionary gift for the help of the Indian, so far as the records show, was one of £100, by Sir Walter Ralieg, in 1589, for the Indians in Virginia, "in special regard and zeal of planting the Christian religion in those barbarous places." His faith was greater than that of the bishop of the Church of England, who, some years later, said that he had, in his diocese, a very good, but very eccentric clergyman, and adduced in proof of his latter qualification that this clergyman "actually believed that the Red Indians of North America could be converted."

The first missionary to the Indians was Eliot, whose activities covered the middle third of the seventeenth century, and resulted in the conversion of more than 1,000 of these same "Red Indians." The close of the nineteenth century found 250,000 natives within the limits of the United States, of whom 60,000 were members of evangelical churches. While the results of Eliot's thirty-eight years have not been proportionately maintained, the work of the two centuries since his time has overcome much of the depravity and degradation which existed in his day.

But we must still hear from our own Associated Executive Committee on Indian Affairs that "We are all finding that the effort to lift a people whose minds have been clouded, and whose habits have been those of absolute indifference and idleness, is not the work of a day, year, or even of one generation, but of many years, requiring great faith in God, and persistent effort." It is easy to believe, however, that if there had been more Eliots, and Brainerds, and Penns, not only would much bloodshed and massacre by, and of, Indians, have been avoided, but the door would have been open for the Gospel where no entrance could be found because injustice and cruelty fostered a spirit of revenge and made the white man's messages of peace seem a mockery.

The "Century of Dishonor" may be past, but its record is not closed. Doubtless, far less ground for complaint of wrongdoing and broken faith exists to-day than during much—perhaps any—of our nation's history. Yet, but few months pass without a visit or communication from some representative of one of the Western tribes, seeking redress for wrongs from the "Great Father at Washington." Only a few days ago, I saw a party,—a man with painted face, two women and a child,—bare-headed and robed in their gay blankets on the streets of our capital city. And while such scenes are possible, our work is not closed.

Citizenship and holdings in severalty are being arranged for, from time to time, and comfortable Indian homes and well-tilled farms are to be found in many places where the "blanket Indian" would be almost a curiosity. Yet, there are many who are not ready, and for them as for us all, transition periods are perilous, no matter how fraught with purpose of good. It is, no doubt, for this reason that a present-day worker among the Indians says, "During the nineteen years I have been among the Indians, I have never seen such calling for the Gospel as at present."

ALASKAN WORK.

EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

We wish to have pulished in thy paper a short account of the happy Christmas time on Douglas Island.

On behalf of the natives, and for ourselves, we wish to give hearty thanks to each individual member of Kansas Yearly Meeting who assisted in the least in sending the following list of useful and beautiful presents: 109 women's aprons; 10 children's aprons; 144 handkerchiefs, men's women's and children's; 142½ yards of ribbon; 45 pairs of socks; 9 women's collars; 3 men's ties, and quite a number of other gifts, dolls, pins, scrap-books and pictures, boys' knives, and such things as delight other than the native children of Alaska.

With our heavy duties in church, school and home work, our Christmas program was not so long this year as last, but consisted of about sixteen well-prepared numbers of recitations, exercises and music.

The Bible lesson, Luke 2: 7-20, was read by Flora Rudy, one of our strongest workers, and the opening prayer was given by Dick Smith.

We can but say, we wish you could have heard it all. Over two hundred were seated in the large church, and the order, attention and delivery was excellent.

We are glad we can make the statement that the words "Santa Claus" were not mentioned on the program, but each part breathed forth the story of a living Saviour, who gave good gifts to men. The closing number was a thrilling anthem, "Glory to God in the Highest."

We had placed a large tree on the platform, and it was filled with presents. The natives delight to give and spend a great deal of money at this time. We almost felt that we had allowed too much to be sent when we saw them bringing so much; but we were so thankful for the feeling of good-will and genuine happiness that came from the fact that nearly everyone received a present. This could not have been so if the things had not been sent. We feel, too, that the spirit of giving is, no doubt, strengthened among our home workers and the dear juniors who gave so generously. May our Heavenly Father reward each one; and in His own time and way call them into His vineyard to work in the place assigned them.

We were invited to eat Christmas dinner with Kitty Mitchell, a native woman. The dinner was given in the Beach church, and about sixty persons were present. It was our first opportunity to attend such a gathering and we were greatly impressed with the fact that there was a much greater spirit of real devotion and thanksgiving manifested than at similar gatherings which we have attended among white people.

We wish also in this to express our thanks for any other gifts sent to the Mission, and especially the very generous offering of Bibles and Testaments sent by the Bible Association of Friends at Philadelphia.

We ask the prayers of all God's faithful ones that we may be enabled to give forth the true Gospel message during the coming year; and to give it with Power.

AN EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF CHARLES C. HAWORTH.

During this month, Brother Galvez and I went to two villages that Sylvester Jones and I visited two years ago, Bocas and Velasco. Zenas Martin accompanied us. It was his first visit to this part of the country, and he was greatly pleased with it. It is settled up by small land-holders, and is in the best state of cultivation of any part of the country that I know of in our region. I see much progress since my first visit. Then there was very little cultivation, but now it is beautiful to see the small fields of corn and other crops that the farmers have planted, and all looking so nice with the recent rains. It is a good field for work, and this trip makes my conviction stronger that we should enter it at once. Mr. Martin was delighted with the country and the people, and has instructed us to make regular visits there. We can now go in the train, a branch road having just been completed to that region. The fare is about $1.50 for the round trip from Gibara. We will try to go there again soon and rent a hall in Bocas, and arrange for regular services in that place. A missionary and his wife could do a grand work in Bocas, it seems to me. It is five or six miles from each of four other villages of about equal size, being in the center of all.

But these towns are not all; the country is thickly populated. In going along the road one sees houses every few rods, and they are good ones for the country, several of them with board siding and white-washed. The people are religiously inclined, sober and industrious. I believe a work established there would be more nearly self-supporting than in any of our other stations, for the people are not in poverty as are the ones we are most able to reach in cities. I have had this field laid on my heart for two years, but do not see how I can enter it till we have more pastors for the stations we already have. We do need more workers here in Cuba.

I hope that the plans of union, decided upon at the Missionary Conference, will be the means of strengthening all the work, for we do not want to become narrow, and think that our field is the only one, but we do need more help to evangelize this district which we have. "Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that He send forth laborers into His harvest."

Gibara, Cuba, Eleventh month, 1906.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

We cannot express our joy and gratitude that a gracious Providence has placed thee and thy helpers in the editorial chair of our most loved "American Friend." How we appreciate the work you are doing, the stand you take, the inspiring editorials.

Thy friend,

LILLIE GARRETT.

Farmland, Ind.

Arthur B. Chilson preached to a large audience at Westfield, Ind., the 6th inst.

Elwood Lewis, of Georgetown, Ill., recently conducted a protracted meeting at Coloma, Ind.

Chester Friends, in Westfield, Ind., Quarterly Meeting have remodeled their meeting-house at a cost of about $500.

Alva Huddleston, of Pleasant Grove, Ill., and his brother Charles are conducting a successful revival at Hortonville, Ind., which began the 4th inst.

George W. Willis is holding meetings in Indiana Yearly Meeting. Reports from Poplar Run and White Oak are full of enthusiasm. His earnest and thorough evangelistic messages were very helpful and inspiring.

Mooresville, Ind., Meeting is growing both spiritually and numerically. There is a deep current of spiritual life manifest in all the meetings for worship, and new members are coming in at every monthly meeting.

A series of meetings of two weeks' duration closed recently at Bethel, in White Lick Quarter, Ind., conducted by Willis Bond and Lydia Taylor Painter, which resulted in an unusual time of blessing. Many were definitely blessed.

A short series of meetings, continuing from the 25th to the 31st ult., were held at New Garden, Ind., conducted by George W. Willis, of Ohio. The series were necessarily short, owing to other engagements of the evangelist. Much interest was manifested.

A correspondent from San Diego, Cal., desires to call attention to that section of the country. The climate is excellent the year round. A little meeting is flourishing there. Strangers can find the place of meeting at Nineteenth and H Streets; and all are welcome.

Daisy Barr has accepted pastoral work for Fairmount Meeting, in Indiana Yearly Meeting, and has canceled all engagements for evangelistic work, except one for Lynn, Indiana. Fairmount is a stronghold of Friends, and both pastor and people feel that the right thing has been done. The future looks very bright to the Friends there.

Griffith Wright, of Plainfield, Ind., has just closed a meeting at Fairview, near Brooklyn, Ind., of two weeks' duration, which was a time of great blessing to the church and community. Twelve professed conversion, and many were renewed. Seven have applied for membership with Friends' Church.

The recent Christmas exercises at the Mission Station, among the Big Jim Band of Shawnee Indians, was well attended by them. Fifty or sixty, mostly adults, were present. The chief, Joe Billy, took part in the exercises, speaking through an interpreter. They are a very backward tribe, and the work among them is very trying. At present R. Stevenson Burnett and wife Julia are the missionaries.

A series of meetings were held at Spiceland, Ind., beginning the 12th ult., and closing the 9th inst., conducted by John L. Kittrell, evangelist, and the pastor, Fred. E. Smith. The Gospel was presented with great power and clearness. While no great outward manifestation was shown in the number of conversions, the Christians were greatly strengthened. The membership is better equipped for the Master's service, and lasting good was accomplished.

Westfield, Ind., Quarterly Bible School conference was held at Chester, the 5th inst. One interesting feature of the program was two excellent papers read by two young people about fifteen years of age. "The Bible School from a Girl's Standpoint," by India Freeman, and "The Bible School from a Boy's Standpoint," by Herman Briles. "The Lessons of the Year" were given in a comprehensive and interesting paper read by Stella Hale.

The Ministers' Association of Western Yearly Meeting met at First Friends' Meeting, Indianapolis, the 1st inst. The meeting opened with singing and a season of prayer. After transacting the business, Charles R. Axton read a paper on "Evangelist—the man—the message," which was suggestive and full of good thoughts. A lively discussion followed, which was beneficial to all. Adelbert Wood gave an able address at the afternoon session, on "Sin—its origin and remedy," which was enjoyed by all present. The meeting adjourned, to meet the first third-day in Third month next, at Indianapolis.

Charles Lescanet is now located in the meeting at Cherokee, Okla. He recently closed his first quarter's work with a good showing in every department of work. A union thanksgiving service was held at the Friends' meeting-house, and Charles Lescanet preached the sermon. He writes, "We were comforted recently by the presence of our Yearly Meeting Superintendent J. Clarkson Hinshaw; also Quarterly Meeting Superintendent Alvin Coppock and wife, Laura Coppock. Prof. F. Clark of Whittier College, Iowa, and Nathan and Mary Brown, of Stella Meeting." He continues, "I began here at Friends' Valley Monthly Meeting last night, First month 3d. Good interest; good congregations."

Scipio Quarterly Meeting was held at Poplar Ridge, N. Y., the 28th, 29th and 30th ult. Edward Mott, of Cleveland, Ohio, was present, and preached with clearness and power; also the Yearly Meeting Superintendent, J. L. Spicer. After Quarterly Meeting, Edward Mott felt led of the Lord to remain until the following Fourth-day. His service was adapted to the needs, and a few were definitely blessed. J. L. Spicer remained at Poplar Ridge the rest of the week, and gave a lecture each evening. On Sixth-day he held a meeting for children, which was well attended, as he said, "All under one hundred were allowed to come." Twelve children gave testimony in this meeting. A Junior C. E. was organized, with twelve members.

A concerned Friend, who feels that our readers should notice our national appropriations, sends the following table of estimates for 1908, transmitted to Congress at the opening of the present session:

Legislative establishment.....	$ 5,618,175
Executive establishment.....	32,571,910
Judicial establishment.....	980,120
Foreign intercourse.....	3,254,077
Military establishment.....	79,950,102
Naval establishment.....	115,444,950
Indian affairs.....	7,970,160
Pensions.....	138,243,000
Public works.....	95,865,540
Postal service deficiency.....	Indefinite
Miscellaneous.....	59,244,088
Permanent annual appropriations.....	149,886,320

Grand totals.....$689,028,453

He goes on to say that appropriations, both a year ago for 1907, and now for 1908, apply nearly one-half of the total annual appropriations for the current expenses of the Government to warlike means and measures, and the results of war, and that in a time of entire peace, when the leading peoples are seriously considering the reduction of armaments and beginning to desire to 'beat swords into plow shares.'

SOME DAY.

It is not given me to know
Why paths unkind my feet must tread,
Why through deep waters I must go,
Why dark clouds gather overhead;
But this I know; it is Thy hand
That leadeth me; some day I'll understand.

Why plans should fail and friends forsake,
And eyes, once kind, look coldly on,
While smiling lips hide hearts that ache,
And bid farewell to fond hopes gone,
I know not. Thou knowest, and Thy hand
Still leads. Some day I'll understand.

O glad to-morrow! When the darkening mist
That veils mine eyes shall roll away,
And I shall view the hilltops, kissed
By the sun of that eternal day,
It shall appear why thus Thy hand
Hath led. Then I shall understand.

The Shah of Persia died last week. His people are seriously objecting to what they consider large unnecessary expenses in connection with the funeral services.

An eighth of a mile straight up into the air will be the height of the new Metropolitan Life Insurance Building in New York. Even New York papers begin to ask timidly what the limit will be on Manhattan Island.

The world's visible stocks of wheat at the beginning of the new year aggregate 220,457,000 bushels, which is the largest amount in sight for the season in ten years. These stocks are uncommonly well distributed, the American share being little more than half the total, or 132,000,000 bushels. This explains the low prices and dull export trade.

 OF TROUBLE.

"I have been troubled with my stomach for years, having the habit of vomiting and spitting up my food, and was all run down, and September last I had a fearful hemorrhage which completely prostrated me. When I got up even a rare porterhouse steak distressed me.

"Then I happened to meet a lady who had trouble just like mine, and who used Grape-Nuts food, and it agreed with her, so I bought a box and found I could keep it down, and it nourished and built me up, and I have used it constantly since then, usually twice a day. I have gained in flesh and can eat almost anything I want, and my stomach takes care of it without any hesitation, but before I toned and strengthened my stomach on Grape-Nuts I could not handle any food but it was liable to come up again.

grants passed the million mark for the first time, being 1,059,755. This year the number has increased to 1,167,353, which breaks the previous record by more than 100,000. Of these, comparatively few come from the northern and western countries of Europe. Italy furnishes the largest quota—273,120, a gain of more than 50,000 over last year. Austria-Hungary, 265,188. Russia, 215,655, a gain of more than 30,000 over last year. The other countries do not pass the 200,000 mark.

Many of our readers will remember the fight between the Rapid Transit Company and the people of New York and Brooklyn over the collection of a double five cent fare to Coney Island, which occurred last spring. The fight resulted in a mild form of riot. The Rapid Transit Co. finally agreed to refund all second fares, provided the courts decided against them. They issued receipt slips, which were given to every passenger when second fares were collected. Of course, the slips were worth five cents or nothing, just as the court finally decided the case. These slips were accepted in many business houses and by many newspapers for three cents; in fact, a disposition to gamble on the chances of making a handsome margin on these little due bills (?) actually gave them an exchange value of three cents. The Appellant Court has just decided that the Traction Co. had a legal right to collect two fares, and, accordingly, the receipt slips are worthless. The Legislature will be appealed to for relief. Should they refuse to act or fail to sustain the people they will lose the full face of the receipt slips.

The Raines-law, which regulates liquor traffic in New York State, provides that no alcoholic beverage can be sold on First-days, except when ordered with a meal. For the purpose of dodging this provision, what is known as the Raines-law sandwich came into use. In many cases it was a poor excuse, being made from tough, stale bread and ham. The purchaser would order a sandwich, accompanied with the desired liquor. After imbibing, the sandwich was shoved back to be ordered by a second customer. The Appellant Division of the Supreme Court has just decided that this practice is a violation of the law, and that hereafter no alcoholic beverage can be sold on First-days only where food designed in good faith for a meal is served.

From The Literary Digest and its clippings, we take the following paragraphs, reviewing the past year:

"The spectacular features in the retrospect must be credited to the forces of inanimate nature rather than to any activity of man. Thus the eruption of Vesuvius, the terrible destruction wrought by earthquakes in California and in Chile, and the wholesale obliteration of life by the monsoon, which swept Hongkong harbor, are among the incidents which stand out in lurid relief. In the world of practical politics, say our newspaper commentators, 1906 registered notable gains for the principles of Democracy. It has been called 'the year of parliaments,' since it recorded the birth of the Russian Douma, the

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

FEW PEOPLE KNOW HOW USEFUL IT IS IN PRESERVING HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but, on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

formulation of a constitution for Persia, and the promise that even China is definitely feeling her way toward some form of representative government. For the United States it has been a period of dazzling and amazing prosperity.

"The farms on the whole have yielded unprecedented crops, yet the consumption of products has been so great as to prevent a serious decline in farm prices. The factories have worked to their full capacity, yet have been unable to keep up with the demand. The mines of copper and iron and other useful metals have greatly increased their output, yet consumption has been greater and forced prices higher. The railroads have expended enormous sums of money upon enlarged trackage and additional rolling stock and other facilities, yet have been overwhelmed by the great volume of additional business thrown upon them.

"The year saw the opening of the Simplon railway tunnel and the completion of English railroads from the Nile to the Red Sea and across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Peary got nearer to the North Pole than any of his predecessors, and Amundsen completed the navigation of the Northwest Passage."

HEART AND NERVES FAIL ON COFFEE.

A resident of a great western State puts the case regarding stimulants with a comprehensive brevity that is admirable. He says:

"I am 56 years old and have had considerable experience with stimulants. They are all alike—a mortgage on reserved energy at ruinous interest. As the whip stimulates, but does not strengthen the horse, so do stimulants act upon the human system. Feeling this way, I gave up coffee and all other stimulants and began the use of Postum Food coffee some months ago. The beneficial results have been apparent from the first. The rheumatism that I used to suffer from has left me, I sleep sounder, my nerves are steadier and my brain clearer. And I bear testimony also to the food value of Postum—something that is lacking in coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. There's a reason. PLANT GREGORY'S SEEDS.

THEY'RE HONEST SEEDS, SAFE AND SURE, AND SOLD AT A REASONABLE PRICE.

Year after year, for over half a century, thousands of practical gardeners and planters, both in the United States and Canada, have been planting Gregory's Seeds, and they have done so because they know that these seeds have all been thoroughly tested, and that the three warrants under which Gregory's Seeds are sold cover all seed risks.

Just think of it! Over two thousand tests of the vitality of both vegetable and flower seeds are made every season, and thousands of dollars' worth of seed are thrown away, though most of it is better than box seed will average.

Messrs. Gregory & Son have produced many new varieties of vegetables, of one introducing more than all other dealers combined. They distribute free among their customers tubers of the famous Eldorado Potato which sold in England three years ago for over a thousand dollars a pound.

All growers of vegetables, flowers and fruits should secure a copy of Gregory's new catalogue for 1907. It is rich in practical instruction.

Write to-day, so that you will be sure of getting a copy. Address J. J. H. Gregory & Son, Marblehead, Mass.

Our Christlike God.

IT is Christ who has taught us that to be God is not to be a mighty king enthroned above the reach of His creatures, but that to be God is to have more love than all besides, to be able to make greater sacrifices for the good of all, to have an infinite capacity to humble Himself for others. If in Christ we find at last the real nature of God, if we may always expect such faithfulness and help from God as we have in Christ, if to be God is to be as full of love in the future as Christ has shown himself in the past, then may not existence yet be that perfect joy our instincts crave, and towards which we are slowly and doubtfully finding our way through all the darkness and distress, the shocks and fears, which are needed to sift what is spiritual in us from what is unworthy.

FRIENDS are realizing as never before that their usefulness is greatly enhanced by a clear understanding of their history and message. The demand for modern books on these subjects is increasing. The two best brief works which have yet appeared are the following:

The Rise of the Quakers

By T. EDMUND HARVEY

This account of THE RISE OF THE QUAKERS gives the important facts about the early history of the Society in a clear and interesting style. It is accurate in detail and comprehensive in view. The interpretation of the early message is a happy selection of vital truths, well put. Every friend should have this little book.

A History of the Friends in America

By ALLEN C. and RICHARD H. THOMAS

This work, revised by Allen C. Thomas, sketches with skill the early settlements of Friends in America, their sufferings, growth, labors and migrations. The accounts of the separations are impartial, and the subsequent history of the different branches is given separately. An entirely new chapter on the "Latest Years" has been added, bringing the work up-to-date. Few histories have been written with more care, and few have more useful information, clearly stated in less space.

"A work which is likely for many days to be a standard text-book on the subject."—The London Friend.

"We have read it with interest. It gives evidence of much research and of a disposition to observe the impartiality of faithful historians."—THE FRIEND, Philadelphia.

A SERIOUS CALL.

THE OUTBREAK of tongues in Akron and Cleveland, Ohio, spoken of last week, is by itself a matter of little importance, and might be left without farther notice, if it were not for the fact that it is a symptom of a larger trouble which threatens to swamp American Quakerism. Those of us who have been carefully watching the currents of our spiritual life have known for a long time that very dangerous tendencies were at work among us and slowly disintegrating our power—tendencies all the more dangerous, because nobody was willing to discuss them, and point them out.

We print in another column a few of the many newspaper reports which we have received, telling of this outbreak of tongues. The reports are calm and unsensational accounts, otherwise we should not print them. There have been many meetings of this sort before in various places. The only new feature is the appearance of tongues. The point of serious significance is the excessive emotional strain which sooner or later is bound to produce some of the many abnormal forms that follow these emotional cyclones. It is a mistake to assume that the persons who have shown these traits are deceivers, or deluded by Satan. That is the medieval way out of such difficulties. The whole thing is the natural outcome of highly-wrought, over-strained nervous systems.

Those who encourage a type of religion which paralyzes the will under storms of emotion, those who push meetings to the verge of hypnotism and trance to get results (in the form of conversion or sanctification) are thoroughly unsuitable persons to deal with human souls. Their motives are doubtless good; they, quite likely, are single-hearted in their devotion to the advance of Christ's kingdom. But who of us would be satisfied with a doctor whose only merits were pure motives and devotion? He must also know the nature of the frame he has to deal with. He has no right to excuse his blunders on the plea that he meant well. Now, look at the facts which confront us. There are meetings held, ostensibly as Friends' meetings, where scenes are enacted that are dangerous to physical, mental and moral health—meetings marked by emotional disorders that ought not to be allowed anywhere, in this era of intelligence. But these disorders are only external signs of a deeper trouble which must sooner or later be met and faced if we expect to impress the world as the exponents of spiritual religion. The real trouble, which occasions, every now and then, some form of disorder, is the prevalence among us of a thoroughly unhealthy type of religion. It is a Christianity with its balance lost. It insists on a single type of conversion as essential to salvation, as though there were no other way to Divine forgiveness. It reduces holiness, with all its rich and infinite meaning, to a single, definite, immediate experience, no more like apostolic sanctification than a photograph is like a living person. It transforms the teaching of the Kingdom of God—Christ's supreme revelation of the meaning of life—into a miraculous second coming, though that Christ Himself said, "Lo, I am with you always." It belittles learning and finds spirituality rather in emotional experiences. It discourages full, rounded development of the mind. It would reduce every one of our educational institutions to the level of its own narrow idea of truth. It is harsh and uncharitable, as unloving as it is narrow.

Sincere and honest, its leaders are. We have no word of criticism to utter of their intention or their purpose. They want to produce a Quakerism of a certain definite type. It is a type, however, which leads to ranterism, bigotry, division and emotional disorders. It lacks depth of insight, power of steadiness and control, poise of judgment, ability to unify, or capacity to deal with the trend of thought, which for better or worse is now upon us. It is a movement which in the nature of things cannot save us. It can only leave us stranded, high and dry, from the main currents of spiritual life and thought, with our once noble mission gone.

It is a young man who writes these words, one who has loved his Church with a love that would halt at no sacrifice for it, one who hopes many years to work for it, and serve it with whatever powers have been given him. But one thing is as sure as the pole star, the young, thoughtful Friends of America are determined to have a Quakerism characterized by the genuine spiritual power, breadth and health of the apostolic period or none. We expect to sacrifice and suffer, we are ready to bear hardships and labors, but we will not take for bread that which does not really feed our souls. If the leaders of our Church allow things to drift toward the rocks they will have themselves to blame.

THE PROHIBITION SITUATION IN THE STATE OF MAINE.

We print, elsewhere, the section from the message of the Maine Governor, William T. Cobb, dealing with the prohibition situation in the State. It is a calm, straightforward document, and should be read by all who are interested in the prohibition question, and who of us is not?

It should be said, for the benefit of those who do not know it already, that the "Sturgis law," discussed at length in this message, is a law passed by the last legislature to enforce the prohibitory law in sections where the local officers are inefficient, negligent, or corrupt, and in sections, too, where local sentiment does not support the prohibitory law.

The Governor says: "Probably no single piece of legislation placed on our Statute Books has ever caused so much general discussion as the Sturgis law." That law was passed to put an end to nullification. The Governor says, and says rightly, that "the nullification of the prohibitory law is the greatest issue confronting the people of Maine." It is the beginning of the end of government, when law is ignored, defied, nullified.

There were only two possible courses open to an honest, manly governor—to secure the repeal of the law, which in Maine is embedded in the Constitution, or to enforce it at every cost and hazard. Governor Cobb took this latter course.

The "Sturgis law" has aroused a fierce opposition; it even threatened the defeat of the governor who was responsible for it. The question now lies between this drastic, vigorous method of enforcement and repeal. The report of the Enforcement Commission, promised in the message, should be a very important document in the history of temperance legislation, and we shall endeavor to put it in whole, or in part, before our readers, when it is issued. The facts bear out the Governor's statement that there is a strong sentiment in favor of allowing the people themselves to decide again whether they want the sale of liquor prohibited in the State. In any case, the prohibition battle is on in the old temperance State, and tremendous consequences hang on the issue.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

PRAYER.

BY AUGUSTUS T. MURRAY.

If we are right in thus thinking of prayer as an act of worship, it will follow that the effect of prayer will be seen not in God but in the worshipper,—not in a real or imaginary deflecting of the will of God from its course, but in its influence upon the character of him who prays; and this influence will be a purifying influence. Indeed, "he that hath clean hands and a pure heart," and he, alone, can enter into the holy place for worship or for prayer; he, alone, can commune with God. True, the soul, burdened with a sense of sin, may cry aloud for forgiveness, and so that prayer be sincere we know that it is heard. It was the repentant publican that our Lord commended, not the one who thanked God that he was not as other men; and in Isaiah's vision the revelation of the glory of God brought to the prophet first of all a sense of his own unworthiness. Yet, he was cleansed, and sent forth with a divine commission to speak to his people in Jehovah's name. We may, indeed, say that genuine repentance of itself brings the soul nearer to God and paves the way for blessing, and that this is an illustration of the purifying power of prayer. Dare you come before God to ask that that may be yours which should rightly be another's? Dare you pray that you may outstrip another in the race for honor, for office, for fame, when you know that your gain can only mean his loss? Can you look up to the Father when all your thoughts are fixed on things below? Such petitions are not prayer. "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts." There is no room in the selfish heart for prayer, and no place in prayer for the selfish wish. All that is petty, or mean, or selfish must fade away when the thoughtful soul bows to pray. These things are excluded by the very nature of prayer.

And of what avail is a prayer for forgiveness, unless the soul is ready to be cleansed? Let us take an extreme case. A weak nature after sinning grievously in yielding to base impulses may be filled with remorse, and pray for forgiveness, even while knowing well that the same base instincts will again assert their mastery, and that he will again show himself their slave. Does God hear that prayer? Nay, though he make the words of the Psalmist his own, and cry out in terror, "Create in me a clean heart, O God!" what profits it, if it lead him not to right living? To such as he the word of Jehovah was long ago given: "When ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear." "Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well." Then, and then alone, can a man pray; but those who do put away the evil of their doings hear the "voice celestial," which begins with the pathetic words—

"Although your sins

As scarlet be," and ends, "white as snow."

Yes, many a man wanders far from God and disclaims prayer, who really cannot pray,—cannot lift his heart, his desires, above what is low. Though he declares that God cannot answer prayer, yet in truth "the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save, neither His ear heavy, that it cannot hear; but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid His face from you that He will not hear." But if one prays with a pure heart, looking away from self, and the things of self, to Him "who unwillingly sees one of His little ones lost," he will, indeed, come to know the power, the efficacy, and the blessedness of prayer.

Again, the influence of prayer will be a strengthening influence. No one can commune with God, and not go forth heartened to meet his duty, his trials, his temptations. "I write unto you, young men," wrote the apostle, "because ye are strong;" but how weak we are! Strong as we may feel ourselves in our physical bodies, in our mental equipment, or in moral resolve; yet when we are brought face to face with life's great crises, when the props that have supported us heretofore give way or are taken from us, or it may be when sorrow falls with crushing weight, or the burden of the mystery seems too heavy for us, where is then our strength? There are times in every life when "even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall,"—times when our faith seems to fail us, when we feel ourselves alone, and when the light which radiates from the mount of vision fades away and all seems dark. In such times as these, prayer can teach us the truth of Isaiah's glorious words: "But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk and not faint." So many a soul has come this realization, and with it the heartening message, "Fear thou not, for I am with thee, be not dismayed, for I am thy God."

But the influence of prayer should be more than purifying, more than strengthening; it is hallowing. Genuine prayer lifts us up to the high places of spiritual living,—to a point where our wills are brought into harmony with the divine will. True, the purpose of the ages waits not on man for its fulfillment; but man has, none the less, a real place in God's universe; and it may be his to know that his life and his work are furthering the plans of his Creator. No rational man will, of course, knowingly set his will in opposition to the will of the Eternal; but many a man does go through life without concerning himself about what the will of God may be. For such, there is, of course, no real prayer, even though, now and again in the crises of life, petitions rise to their lips. But if a man wills to walk as a servant of God, as a son of God, for him, prayer is communion with the Father. By prayer, he is kept from evil; by prayer, he is heartened to meet life's trials and bear life's burdens; and by prayer, his spiritual insight is deepened.

Jesus prayed, not only at certain crucial points in His ministry, but constantly. Prayer was to Him an habitual, as it was a normal act. It was the atmosphere in which He lived. Brief and fragmentary as are our records of His life, we are told how, again and again, He retired from the multitudes that thronged about Him to be alone with the Father; and in the closing scenes of that great tragedy, when human companionship failed Him, and those He loved could not watch with Him for one brief hour,—in the agony in the garden, the veil is lifted for a moment, and we are permitted to see a little way into the heart that broke for us. "O, my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt."

Many a human soul has its own Gethsemane, when it is forced to bow beneath the anguish of bereavement, of failure, of doubt,—of any one of those mysterious providences whereby the soul of man is tried; and well for that man who rises superior to the struggle, and comes forth chastened and hallowed, purified as precious metal in the fire of suffering, with grace to echo the Master's prayer, "Nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt."

For it is an illuminating fact, and one proved by the experience of many devout souls, that although one may feel one's self burdened with a great desire, a desire, too, which one can consciously cherish, and may kneel with the thought of making this the very prayer of the heart, yet under the blessed influence of communion with God, the eyes of the spirit are opened, and one sees things unimagined before, so that the great desire fades away, and the burden of one's prayer is wholly different. Under this blessed influence one does not ask amiss, for one has no thought of self; and the astounding promise quoted at the beginning of this paper finds its literal fulfillment: the Father's will is our will.

Does one ask, "For what may I pray, if all that comes to pass is but the result of inalterable law, whereby given causes must produce given results? Granted that there is a blessing in bowing before God, yet, for what may I ask, and why should one ask for anything?" But I have not said that God cannot, or does not, hear us. I have only said that the true reason for prayer and the true virtue in prayer consist rather in communion with the Eternal than in the preferment of petitions,—in seeking to obtain for ourselves things that we desire; and that one who has given up the thought of a God whose will may be altered by the prayers of men, may, none the less, hold to the habit of prayer, and feel that he has in prayer a source of blessing and of strength.

The most learned of men is very far from having mastered the whole of truth, or from having learned the whole scope of God's laws. All that is known or imagined, all of our science and of our metaphysics, is as nothing compared with the vast domain of the unknown and the unknowable. Who shall say that there are not other, and it may be, higher laws that we know not, so that in very truth "more things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of?" To the average onlooker the tricks of the magician seem to transcend natural law; but to the trained observer, it is plain that, apart from mere cleverness, there are other laws—well known to the psychologist—in obedience to which the startling effects are produced. There is no transcending of law, but only the operation of law.

May not similar principles be imagined to hold good in higher things as well? Startling, indeed, have been some of the clearly attested ways in which prayer has been answered. For some cases, the psychologist has an explanation to offer; others baffle him, and seem, in the light of our present knowledge, to be incredible. Yet to one whose spiritual vision is quickened, such cases but show how the magic of God's chemistry brings sweetness and light and beauty, where these things seemed unimaginable,—brings life where there had seemed to be but death. Certain is it that there is a vital energy in prayer, which quickens the conscious powers and wondrously enlarges the capacity of the individual. Furthermore, while we neither see nor look for the doing away with, or the over-riding of, God's own laws, He does marvellously control the effects of those laws upon the individual, so that blessing flows in upon him in ways unlooked for.

No man, therefore, may say for what another may pray or for what he may not pray. Ask your own heart. Offer any prayer that comes from the heart, which you can utter, when you have withdrawn from the world and feel yourself alone with God. May not father and mother pray for the life of their little one, when it is hourly ebbing? May they not pray for their boy, that he may be kept strong and pure in the hour of temptation? Aye, they may; and find help and strength and comfort in prayer. We can even understand how both sides in a great struggle may pray for victory, each trusting that its cause is just; but better than any prayer for victory were Joab's brave words, when he faced the hosts of Ammon and of Syria: "Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and the cities of our God: and the Lord do that which seemeth Him good."

"The Lord do that which seemeth Him good." Leave the issue with Him, "in whose hands are all the corners of the earth," "who taketh up the isles as a very little thing." Our part is to "be of good courage, and play the men,"—to perform faithfully the duty that lies nearest, be it hard or easy, and to work out our own salvation by bringing our wills and our lives into harmony with the will of God.

For all is well, though we walk in the dark, though our burden be heavy and the journey long. When faith is weak, turn to prayer and know its efficacy; for it will bring the very peace of God. "Be careful for nothing," wrote the great apostle, "but in everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

The peace of God. Compared with this, how insignificant becomes the granting of any lesser desire that the human heart can conceive.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

FRAGRANT CHRISTIANS.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

Our divine Master directs his disciples to be luminous: "Let your light shine!" He reminds them that they are to be the salt of the earth, to preserve society from moral corruption. There is also a steady, and often unconscious, influence shed off from the genuine Christian which may be likened to the fragrance shed by aromatic plants. Travelers in Southern France can detect at once their entrance into the lavender-producing districts—the air is laden with grateful perfumes.

In the Canticles, there is a lively picture of the Church as an "inclosed garden," with its pleasant fruits, its pomegranates, its cinnamon, its myrrh, and all the chief spices. Then follows the prayer, "Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden that the spices thereof may flow out!" As odors may lie latent in a plant, so graces may remain undeveloped in a Christian. What is needed is to call them forth. Pruning is a sharp process, but God's people often require it to make them faithful. Certain processes are needed also to make them fragrant.

A "north wind" is prayed for to start the odors. Perhaps this may signify the work of the Divine Spirit in producing deep conviction of sin and shortcomings. Christians need to be convicted of sin as much as unregenerate sinners. Many of the most pungent calls to repentance in the New Testament are addressed to the members of those early churches. Peter was under heart-rending conviction of most odious sin when he went out of Pilate's courtyard weeping bitterly. That started the spices; for true contrition has the savor of a sweet smell in God's estimation. Many years ago a powerful awakening occurred in one of our theological seminaries. The "north wind" of the Holy Spirit's power smote so mightily that some of the students abandoned their hopes, threw away all their previous impressions as shallow and unsatisfactory, and experienced a deep, thorough reconversion, that went down to the root of character. One of the best evidences of the power of a revival is that it brings delinquent church members to repentance. The same strong gale that uproots false professors, sets the spices of penitence flowing from those who had grown indolent or worldly-minded. Awake, O north wind, and blow upon our churches!

God has many methods of developing the graces of His children. Discipline is one of them. They tell us that the juniper plant emits the sweetest odor when it is flung into the fire. We all know that bruised flowers yield the most fragrance. I have had some striking exhibitions—among my own flock—of the influence of severe trials in bringing out the richest and noblest traits of Christian character. A lovely young woman has preached to me far more eloquently from her dying pillow than I had ever preached to her from the pulpit. Another one, under pecuniary adversities, has been like a shaken cinnamon tree; her cheerful fortitude has proved that nothing can impoverish a soul that is enriched with the unsearchable riches of Christ. Bereavement has sent its bitter blast into some of our families; yet the odors of riven hearts have been sweet with the spirit of submission. Almost every believer's experience contains the record of severe trials which were sent in order to shake the spice trees.

"Who bears a cross prays oft and well;
Bruised herbs send forth the sweetest smell;
Were plants ne'er tossed by stormy wind,
The fragrant spices who would find?"

The inspired poet of the Canticles also prays for the "south wind to come upon my garden." Not only the keen north wind that may bring us to repentance, and the sharp blasts of adversity to test and develop our faith; but God is asked to send the warm south wind of love to melt us into gratitude and praise. A great blessing sent upon a church, or upon a Christian, often makes the hearts thus blessed to become like a bank of violets under a May shower. Do we not need to have more of the felt presence of Jesus in our souls, and more of the warm breath of His love to set all our affections growing and glowing and breathing out a holy joy? However softly the south wind may blow upon the lavender bushes, it is from the bushes themselves that the fragrance must be diffused. The balmiest of zephyrs cannot draw sweet odors from a pig-weed or a thistle. Dead trees yield no fragrance. It is from a zealous, earnest, Christ-imitating life that the sweet, attractive influences flow forth; but you and I must do the living.

Be courageous. Be independent. Only remember where the true courage and independence come from.
—Phillips Brooks.

If the world is ever conquered for our Lord, it is not by ministers, nor by office-bearers, nor by the great and noble and mighty, but by every member of Christ's body being a working member; doing his work; filling his own sphere; holding his own post; and saying to Jesus, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"—Thomas Guthrie.

Sawders is not a Friend, and the Akron meetings were not under the care of Friends. The first appearance of the gift was in Alliance, and it has spread from there.]

"Chi Ch-chi chi cheechi chico allioo wawa ik oorsti woobolachici boochi meeni tio cheena halliwaho ooma wada ferchi hookaliba tata. Mo chichichi cho cheka kow ta hooligoola."

These words, uttered gutturally, and with voices pitched in a high key are specimens of the utterances which are to be heard from the mouths of the speakers of unknown tongues at the meetings conducted in South Akron by Miss Ivy Campbell in the Gospel Church.

An all day meeting was held Sunday. In the evening, after the long hours of exhortation, singing and praying, many were overcome by their religious feelings. The seats were filled with those "seeking," and the standing room was crowded with curious ones. At one time in the evening, as many as forty were lying or kneeling about the church in the different degrees of unconsciousness. Cries of every description filled the room, the frantic whimperings of a child, the hysterical wails of women and the powerful groans of strong men as if in great pain. As a burden to these shrieks and cries there was a constant undertone of praying and shoutings of "amen" and "hallelujah." Through it all Miss Campbell, the leader of the movement, stood on the pulpit and pleaded with the people to lay aside lives of sin and seek sanctification. One woman was seized suddenly with the "power" and fell against a seat, cutting open the back of her head. She fell to the floor and lay there weeping, wailing and shaking violently, while others kneeled beside her and spoke to her with a strange tongue. A carriage was brought for her removal, but she could not be taken away.

An old man was sitting in his chair with his head thrown back at a frightful angle, his eyes closed. He lay in this condition for hours and then began to scream and throw his arms about as if in great agony. He finally came to and announced that he had received the spirit. Women rushed up to him with tears streaming down their faces and shook his hands.

A child six years old was lying on her back on the floor, eyes closed, and arms constantly shaking above her head. She was keeping up a constant, monotonous whisper that rose above all the other sounds in the room. Two young women were kneeling over her and, in turn, shrieking to her rapidly in the strange chatter of the gifted ones. People were lying flat on their backs on the stage, and the rail about the altar was crowded with men and women kneeling and lying on the floor, engaged in prayer or shouting words of praise alternately with words of the strange tongue, all had a haggard, strained appearance on their faces.

Many people were converted Sunday, and the meetings are to be kept up indefinitely.

ITEM ON MEETINGS IN CLEVELAND.

Doubt as to the genuineness of some of the wonderful manifestations purported to have been experienced by penitents at the revival meetings being held at the First Friends' Church, on Cedar Avenue, was expressed at a meeting of the congregation after the morning service yesterday. A committee was appointed to consider the advisability of a continuance of the meetings in their present form, and under their present auspices.

Announcements from certain young men and women who are attending the Bible school run in connection with the church of the marvellous "gift of tongues," as well as the casting out of demons are seriously questioned by some of the members of the congregation. For the purpose of determining upon a policy to be adopted, a meeting was called after the morning service yesterday, which was attended only by members of the church, all others being excluded.

For an hour and a half the discussion was carried on, and various opinions were expressed. Some of the members advanced the opinion that the revival was going too far, and was not being conducted along lines in accord with the faith of the Friends' denomination. Others maintained that the meetings were perfectly in accord with the spirit of the Friends' belief, even if the Revivalist, Rev. J. E. Sawders, Akron, is not a member of the denomination.

It was finally decided to leave the matter in the hands of a committee to determine if the meetings are to be continued this week. This committee will meet this morning, and come to a decision in the matter. The committee consists of Rev. J. Walter Malone, pastor of the church, and Messrs. Calvin Choate, William Pinkham and Edward Mott.

It has been noted, during the time since the services started, last Wednesday, that all of the "manifestations" have occurred among the students of the Bible Training School, which is operated in connection with the church. Members of the congregation claim that in not a single instance has a member of the church been visited with any unusual power.

Edward Bremner, a prominent member of the congregation, last night declared he expressed the general sentiment of the members of the church, when he said that the committee was simply appointed for the purpose of determining, if possible, if good was really being accomplished by the revival, operated as it is.

"We believe in God and in His power to do all things," declared Mr. Bremner, "and we believe in revivals, but the question concerning all of these manifestations is, 'are they genuine?'" This so-called gift of tongues has come only to the students and to one woman from Akron, who came to assist at the revival.

"This is our regular yearly week of prayer, and the revivalist who is conducting the meetings was not invited by the church to take charge of them, but merely requested by our pastor to assist. His beliefs are different from ours, and some of his doctrines are not in accord with those of the Friends' Church. The meetings will go on, but there is some doubt as to their character being just the same as they have been during the past week."

William Guest, another member of the congregation, also expressed some doubt yesterday as to the reality of some of the miracles. He said that the First Friends' Church was of a class not as straight-laced as others of the same faith, but, nevertheless, some of the results of the revival have been a little surprising even to those who were willing to have a "wide open" series of revival meetings.

Many exciting events occurred yesterday at the Friends' Church. More demons were cast out, and at least two new manifestations of gifts of tongues became apparent. One young woman, who says she never looked inside of a lexicon in her life, babbled for nearly an hour in what is said to be the Greek language.

Edith Ranson, until a year ago a student at the Bible Training School, is one on whom the language of the Greeks was bestowed. She writhed in prayer at the altar until she received her Pentecost, and with it the gift of tongues. She was taken into another room, and there she talked in the strange dialect for nearly an hour. A teacher of literature in one of the city schools claims to have interpreted some of the language, and declares that it is Greek.

For three long hours yesterday, converts, seeking their Pentecost and unusual gifts from heaven wrestled for them at the church altar. Shortly before the evening service began, one young woman, sobbing and laughing alternately, lay on her back near the pulpit, half a dozen singing and praying friends bending over her and beseeching her not to give up the battle.

At another side of the pulpit lay a young man, in a semi-conscious condition, not moving for half an hour or more. All through the meeting half a dozen converts knelt at the altar, not heeding the service, but praying fervently, sometimes breaking out loud in their supplications, but for the most part unconscious of everything going on about them.

PROHIBITION IN MAINE.

From the annual message of Governor Cobb:

Two years ago, speaking in this place, and under similar circumstances, I ventured the assertion that the public condition resulting from the nullification of the prohibitory law was the greatest issue confronting the people of Maine. The representatives of the people met that issue, recognized its importance and the Sturgis Law was enacted, a measure designed for no purpose other than to correct or lessen the evils of nullification. Under its provisions the Enforcement Commission was appointed, and for about eighteen months Maine has witnessed the unusual spectacle of men clothed with legal authority, but operating directly through Executive option and initiative, performing some of the functions of certain officials elected by popular vote, who either wilfully, or lacking both courage and ability, have neglected the duties imposed upon them by their oath of office. Probably no single piece of legislation placed on our Statute Books has ever caused so much general discussion, or created such intense and bitter differences of opinion and dissensions as the Sturgis Law. I cherish no illusions in regard to it. I know it is condemned by many as false in principle, and contrary to the spirit of our institutions, expensive, inefficient, the outgrowth of political necessity, and the last desperate attempt of fanaticism to check the swelling movement for a liberal and cosmopolitan treatment of the liquor problem. I know that a hostile sentiment hastens to censure not only the law itself, but the men charged with its enforcement and their methods. Their failures are magnified and ridiculed, their successes overlooked or belittled, their sincerity of purpose and honesty of motive openly and often maliciously questioned, and the belief assiduously cultivated and encouraged that they are the known disturbers of the peace, the real enemies of order. But these arguments, criticisms and accusations are neither unanswerable nor unassailable. Many of them are palpably superficial and unfair, and the Sturgis law will stand or fall by a fair presentation of the facts and their rigorous analysis, not by the demands of a self-interested prejudice or the exigencies and hopes of any political party.

There will be placed before you, at an early date, by the Enforcement Commission, a full and complete report of the operation of this law, and a statement of all the expense attending it. Upon its publication it is to be expected that this whole question will be opened for debate by the members of this assembly, and this debate will be welcomed by all. At the present time the Deputy Enforcement Commissioners are withdrawn from all the counties. This course was simply an act of justice to the incoming sheriffs, and the insinuation that it was prompted by any other motive might have been withheld in all fairness until a later date. If it becomes apparent that the local officials intend to permit or resume a policy of non-enforcement, and the services of the Deputy Commissioners are not again brought into requisition, there will then be ample opportunity for just and timely criticism.

The essential features of the Sturgis law are clear and its purposes obvious. I have yet to hear any sound argument in behalf of nullification of the law, and but few men have had the temerity to openly advocate it. All will agree to the proposition that the local officials should enforce the prohibitory law in the first instance, but if they fail to do this, and it is known that they have failed, the fact still stands that the law is nullified and needs vindication by some other means. When this question was before the last Legislature there were three ways by which the nullification of the prohibitory law could have been prevented: First, by dutiful action of the local officials; second, by the repeal of the prohibitory law itself, involving resubmission and the adoption of some method of license to regulate the liquor traffic, and third, by the authorization and exercise of powers similar to those granted the Enforcement Commissioners under the Sturgis law. The local officials could not or would not act, prohibition continued to be the policy of the State, and a trial of the Sturgis law was imperative. I am attempting to discuss the measure purely as a means to prevent nullification, and believe that a large majority of the law-abiding citizens of the State, irrespective of party, substantially agree that the law was necessary, and that it has justified its existence. The day of open and easy nullification of the prohibitory law has passed in Maine. Public sentiment and all the moral forces of the State have been aroused and arrayed against it, and it will never return. With all the clamor against the expense of the Sturgis law, with all the outcry alleging political trickery, insincerity and cowardice on the part of its sponsors and its officials, I still hold to the opinion that the people of Maine believe that nullification is infinitely worse than any law which seeks to prevent it, and respectfully submit that it is incumbent upon every man who believes in the principle of law-enforcement as indispensable to the cause of good government and good citizenship, to support the Sturgis law, or to propose and support some other measure which will advance that cause as well.

The attempt to secure a better enforcement of the prohibitory law by means of the Enforcement Commission has brought the resubmission question into such prominence that a failure to refer to it in this address would invite grave misunderstanding. The statement will stand unchallenged that speculation on the action this Legislature may take in dealing with resubmission is causing more comment, and exciting more interest, than any other topic of public moment in Maine. I enter upon a brief discussion of this question with reluctance, not because of the lack of convictions or an unwillingness to express them, but simply because of the doubt in my mind as to my ability to present some of its phases without violating the proprieties of an occasion upon which references to party politics are neither expected nor desired.

Every thoughtful and fair-minded student of political conditions in Maine must admit that there is a very strong sentiment in favor of the proposition to give the voters an opportunity to express at the polls their opinion of the present prohibitory law. While this sentiment may not be that of the majority now, it surely is held by a very large minority of our citizens, and the results of the September elections last year seem to furnish a complete justification of this conclusion. It is true that the temperance legislation on our Statute Books was placed there during the domination of one political party, and it is also true that nearly every person opposed to the prohibitory law and its enforcement favors resubmission. But it may be asserted, with equal truth, that a belief in the prohibitory law is not confined to the adherents of either of the two great parties, and that the desire for resubmission is not confined to the enemies of that law. There are many men, earnest and sincere in their advocacy and support of temperance and enforced prohibition, who believe those principles will be jeopardized by their resubmission to the people under the only method by which this can be accomplished at this time. To them the cause of prohibition is of far greater importance than the success either of Republicanism or Democracy, and to promote and conserve that cause they organized and maintained the Prohibition party. But they cheerfully sacrificed their own organization in behalf of the greater principle, and allying themselves with another party, because of its promise to enforce the prohibitory law, and its opposition to resubmission, contributed largely to its success. These men feel that resubmission granted by this Legislature would be a distinct and unpardonable betrayal, by the dominant party, of many who worked for and helped to achieve its victory. They insist that resubmission, in its proposed form, is a blow to prohibition, and an attack on temperance, and refuse to endorse the suggestion that the people are entitled to vote on an amendment to the Constitution when a very large number have unquestionably signified a desire to that effect.

It is extremely unfortunate for what I conceive to be the true cause of temperance that a resolution to resubmit the prohibitory amendment must be in form, at least, a practical condemnation by the Legislature of the present policy of prohibition, and not the authorization of a simple referendum to ascertain the people's views. Were it not for this fact, and the probable effect that the mere passage of such a resolution would have upon the friends of the prohibitory movement everywhere, I believe there would be little or no opposition to the reasonable, plain and unencumbered proposition to place the original question before the voters again for their approval or rejection. If that particular and important objection could be removed, and the question referred to the people directly, solely on its merits, and unhampered by the prejudice excited by premature and unnecessary legislative condemnation, the citizens of Maine would rally to reaffirm their belief in the prohibitory law, and the cause of temperance be infinitely strengthened and advanced. For if we accept the principle of the referendum we must recognize the fact that its fundamental strength lies in the right of an appeal to the people, and no good cause, if fairly and properly presented, should hesitate to enter that court or should fear its verdict.

In union there is strength; and yet, when a thing is to be done, one man must do it.—James Parton.

Time.—Impossible to fix.

Place.—Region of the upper Euphrates river. The Ark rested on one of the heights of the Ararat mountainous region.

In order clearly to understand the lesson, chapters 6 and 7 should be read. The story of the Flood is one over which there has been an immense amount of controversy, much of which, as usual, tending to obscure rather than keep the religious teaching.

The historical nature of the Flood has been most generally called in question, and then, its geographical extent. That there was some kind of a deluge seems to a candid mind unquestionable. That the deluge covered only part of the earth seems likewise unquestionable. That the water could cover the earth 22 feet ("fifteen cubits upward") "above all the high mountains," "under the whole heaven" cannot be taken literally. Where could the water, thousands of feet deep, come from? Such a stupendous miracle as that would be is far harder to believe than that a comparatively local deluge is referred to, and described in the somewhat exaggerated language so common among Orientals, and not unusual in the Bible, even in the New Testament. Compare Acts 2: 5; Rom. 1: 8. Again, it would be impossible, that a vessel of the size named, 450 feet long, 75 feet wide, and 45 feet high, could contain a pair of all kinds of land animals, to say nothing of the food required for their subsistence. It would also be a miracle beyond acceptance to suppose, that arctic and tropical animals could have been brought to Noah in Mesopotamia, sustained in the Ark, and on the subsidence of the waters re-distributed over the earth to far distant lands, and islands of the sea, over thousands of miles of ocean, each pair to their own proper habitat. God has not worked in that way in succeeding ages, and we are not called upon to believe that He would act so differently in the days of Noah.

We may then believe that there was an actual deluge, which is described in picturesque eastern language, and that it illustrates a profound religious truth.

It is an interesting and remarkable circumstance that there are traditions of a deluge among many branches of the human race. These traditions are not so widely spread as was once thought—they seem to be wholly absent in Africa, Egypt, China and Japan—and in some cases, the story is so different that it would seem to have had other sources. That the Babylonian and Hebrew traditions had the same source would seem to be incontestable, and therefore, we may believe that the deluge, known as the Flood, took place in Mesopotamia.

1. "Remembered." God never forgets, though sometimes He may seem to forget. "Assuaged." Abated.

2. "Fountains of the deep." The waters from the sea. "Windows of heaven." Rain. "Rain." Probably the heavy rain is meant. Gen. 7: 12.

4 "Seventh month." As there were two years in common use—the Sacred, beginning in April; and the Civil, beginning in October, the month here spoken of may have been either May or October. "The mountains of Ararat." Ararat is a district of country; the modern Mount Ararat is about 17,000 feet high, and is covered with perpetual snow. There is no "Mount Ararat" in the Old Testament.

5. "Tenth month." August or January. The seventeenth day would be ninety-three days after the Ark rested on the mountains.

6. 7. It was forty days and still there was too much water to disembark. "Raven." The raven was held to be a prophet of weather, and possibly this was the reason it was selected. It would seem that it went and came, and so did not prove a sure index of the conditions around the Ark.

8, 9. The raven might have found carrion floating upon the water on which it could feed, but a dove must have vegetable food.

10. "Other seven days." This would seem to imply that seven days had elapsed between the sending the raven and the dove, as mentioned in verse 8.

11. "And the dove came in to him at eventide; and lo, in her mouth an olive leaf plucked off." Literally, "freshly plucked," showing that olive trees were flourishing under what were approximately normal conditions, and this, Noah recognized.

12. "Stayed yet other seven days." So as to be perfectly sure. On sending the dove forth the third time, she does not return, and so Noah knew that the Flood was over.

13. "Six hundred and first year." R. V. See Gen. 7: 6, where it is said Noah was six hundred years old when he went into the Ark.

14. "The second month, on the seven and twentieth day." This would make the whole period one year and eleven days after the Flood began. Gen. 7: 11.

15, 16. "Go forth." The time had come. A new era had begun.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. The story of the Flood illustrates one of the great principles by which God deals with mankind, and as such is used in the New Testament. See Matt. 24:37-39. "At such an hour as ye know not, the Son of Man cometh." Men have had warnings after warnings, and if destruction comes upon them, they can only blame themselves. Noah was a preacher of righteousness, but was not heeded. Preachers of righteousness are not heeded to-day. There may come no deluge to-day, but the results of continued sin are just as sure to come, as the results of a deluge.

2. "Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small;

Though with patience He stands waiting, with exactness grinds He all."

Christian Endeavor.

TOPIC FOR SECOND MONTH THIRD, 1907.

WHAT CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR MEANS TO ME AND TO THE WORLD.

Phil. 2: 1-18. Christian Endeavor Day. (Consecration meeting.)

Second-day, First mo. 28.—C. E. means surrender. Phil. 1: 19-26.
Third-day, First mo. 29.—Having Christ's mind. I Cor. 2: 12-16.
Fourth-day, First mo. 30.—Lowliness. Eph. 4: 1-5.
Fifth-day, First mo. 31.—Confession. Matt. 10: 32-39.
Sixth-day, Second mo. 1.—Service. Matt. 10: 40-42.
Seventh-day, Second mo. 2.—Obedience. II Cor. 10: 1-6.

So great a fact as Christian Endeavor demands an explanation. It didn't happen, for it has been full of purpose from its beginning. Is it a delusion,—a result of misguided enthusiasm, or is it the answer to a great need and a real addition to the spiritual forces of the world? It has been in existence long enough to have graduates from its ranks in every branch of religious activity, and I have yet to hear of anyone regretting the influence of Christian Endeavor in his or her own life, while those who thank God for benefits received from it are everywhere.

To be sure, it has not been, and is not now, without its opponents, who criticize and condemn its work; but if a single one of these has allowed a full and fair test in his Church, and has given it the support that success in any line of work requires, and has still found it unworthy, he differs from those of whom I have had personal knowledge.

Witnessing is a part of the pledged duty of the Endeavorer, and in this the Society seems to be in accord with the declarations of Scripture, "Ye are my witnesses;" "He that offereth praise glorifieth Me;" and, "With the mouth confession is made unto salvation." The key to the success of Endeavor seems to me to be found in the fact that it has made definite and practical application of some of the fundamental principles of Christianity. A few of these have been specifically chosen and an emphasis placed on their observance, not as covering the sum of religious duty, but as affording discipline in matters of faithful obedience along lines of activity that could not help but be fruitful. Performing these, we shall be led to do "Whatever He would like to have us do," which is the sum of Christian living.

A factor that cannot be overlooked whenever Christian Endeavor comes under review, is the enlarged fellowship which results from such a world-wide organization, that makes no distinction of race or creed, if only a saving faith in Christ is professed in connection with some evangelical church. The badge is a passport into the communion of believers wherever it is known, and the coming of the day when "they shall all be one" has, perhaps, been brought nearer by this fact than by any other single agency of the past hundred years.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Herewith are submitted a few practices, which, I believe, would tend towards bringing more members into the Friends' Church, and towards the conversion and induing with spiritual power of our birthright members.

1. Let a few Sabbaths in the year be set apart as special sessions, for inviting and urging sinners to accept Christ as their Savior, and Christians to enter the Friends' Church. These Sabbaths might be those following each quarterly meeting. The sermons for these days would naturally be of an evangelical or doctrinal order. At these meetings let the following methods be used:

2. In order to acquaint the membership with those entering our local churches by letter from other divisions of our ranks, let it be understood that the names shall be read of all persons who have joined the Friends' Church at that place, in that manner, at the intervening monthly meetings, and they shall come forward and take front seats when requested to do so at the close of the sermon.

3. Following this, let a call be made for any in the congregation who desire to unite with Friends to come forward and give a public testimony of salvation from past sins and a desire to live in the future as Christ may direct. Upon the giving of such testimony they shall be assured that their names will be handed in to the Church through the usual channel.

4. An urgent appeal should now be given to the birthright members who have received Christ as their Savior since the last meeting of this kind, and are desirous of living to serve Him in the future, to rise and make a public avowal of these facts.

5. An altar service for those who have been convicted of sin during the meeting might very fittingly close the service.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I am glad that thy editorials reach so many, very glad, because they are so much needed for correction and instruction.

Thine,

C. A. TEBBETTS.

Whittier, Cal.

Edwin Loft is engaged in a meeting in Pleasant Plain Quarter, Iowa.

E. H. Parisho, President of Central College, Neb., began meetings at Marshalltown, Iowa, in the evening of the 14th inst.

Emma F. Coffin is engaged in evangelistic service in the limits of Springdale Quarterly Meeting, Iowa, with good results.

Clarence Gill, of Alliance, Ohio, has just closed a successful series of meetings at New Sharon, Iowa. About 35 took definite steps in surrendering to God.

Melissa S. Fellow, a well-known worker among Oklahoma Friends, and especially in W. C. T. U. work, has been confined at her home, Alva, Okla., with a disabled arm, caused by run-away horses.

At the last monthly meeting at Friends' University, Wichita, Kan., 25 new members were received, making the total for the year just closed nearly 100, and bringing the total membership up to 400. The meeting is doing finely and the school is the best in its history.

We desire the address of Wm. R. Carson, a Friends' minister. Can any one favor us with the information?

For the first time in the history of the meetings, the Western District Monthly Meeting and Haverford Monthly Meeting, both of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, held their sessions to consider the Queries and their answers with men and women together.

The meeting at Ackworth, Iowa, is growing. The Bible School and Christian Endeavor are full of interest and life. The mid-week prayer meeting is a success. B. B. Hiatt is doing pastoral work at this place.

S. Adelbert Wood, of Knightstown, Ind., closed a series of meetings at Walnut Ridge, on New Year's day. His helpful preaching and practical teaching resulted in much good. He later engaged in meetings at Nettle Creek.

A very successful revival was held at West Union, near Monrovia, Morgan County, Ind., beginning the 9th ult., and closing the 23rd—26 sessions in all—conducted by Lewis E. Stout, assisted by the pastor, Calvin Bray. The Gospel was preached with power. Many were moved to decide for a higher life.

Friends, at Greenfield, Ind., are in the midst of a revival. The meetings are under the leadership of Homer J. Coppock, a very promising young man in the ministry, one who seems to feel deeply the responsibility resting upon him. The members are unitedly standing by him in the work, which certainly is very encouraging.

The meeting at Van Wert, Ohio, where Tennyson Lewis is located, is prospering. There has been a great increase in the attendance, and manifest interest in Bible School, until Friends are crowded for room in a house 32 x 72 feet. The Christian Endeavor is doing splendid work with increased membership. The Junior Endeavor is making great gains. This society has been organized only a few months, under Alice Jay Lewis, and now has over sixty working members.

Portland, Ind., has just experienced a great religious awakening. For nine days Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and his assistants, conducted an evangelistic campaign, beginning the 5th inst. There had been much preparation before the meeting began, and in many ways the field was ready for the seed. Friends and six other denominations joined in the effort. It is impossible to measure the results of such a meeting. Many were stirred who had been for years unmoved, and no reason appears why the good work might not go on until many more may know Him in the fullness of His perfect love and leadership. The outlook for Friends is very good in Portland.

C. F. Walker, Leavenworth, Kan., recently conducted meetings at the Friends' Indian Mission, Hillside, I. T., for ten days. It was the greatest revival Hillside has known for years. The entire country was stirred. Twelve were converted, four renewed and two Indians reclaimed. Eleven persons have already united with Friends and others expect to unite later. C. F. Walker was assisted by the missionaries at that place, Irwin and Ethel Dickinson. Most all the conversions and renewals were among adults. C. F. Walker is an able minister, plain and simple in his declaration of the Gospel. Hillside Mission is growing spiritually and a bright future seems to be in store. Good results from family visits and personal work.

A number of our people are interested in a movement favoring a National law compelling all railroads to use a block signal system. Letters and circulars are being sent to all parts of the country, asking Friends to circulate petitions reading as follows: "To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:—We, the undersigned citizens of _____ being deeply impressed with the need of better protection for the traveling public upon the railroads of the United States, hereby petition that you enact a law, requiring all railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, to equip their lines with an adequate block signal system, and to establish a safe maximum speed limit for railway trains." Anyone desiring blanks can secure them from Wm. B. Smith, Redlands, Cal.

Susie Allen is again able to engage in public ministry. She is often with Friends at Alva, Okla., and does considerable family visiting. Henry Fellow finds liberty to preach in this meeting from time to time. He is engaged as a professor in the Territory Normal School. A Bible class, which meets on Sixth-days, finds the study of Genesis very helpful.

Arrangements are in progress to hold a session of the Friends' Summer School of Religious History, at Bryn Mawr College, from Sixth month 14th, to Sixth month 22nd, 1907. It will be remembered that two sessions have been held at Haverford College, one in 1900, and the other in 1904. At the approaching session it is expected that the study will centre about the religious message of the Bible, and the mystical movements in the Christian Church.

The following written by Ida M. Roberts, from Matehuala, S. L. P., Mexico, First month 10th, is full of interest:

"It is needless to say that we are pleased to have him (Raymond S. Holding) in the work in Mexico, and that he seems to 'fit into the place' very readily and naturally. His friends will be glad to know that the change in climate has been very beneficial for the health of his little boy, and he is gaining strength all the time. At present, he is stationed at Cedral, but it is the intention to move him to this place as soon as other workers come to take the work in Cedral. The boarding school has been moved into the Mission property, which has been repaired and improved for the purpose, and the prospects seem good for a successful year's work. School will open the 14th of this month. The medical department is doing good work, and the outlook for the coming year is hopeful."

The Third Biblical Conference of Shawnee Quarterly Meeting (Oklahoma) convened Fifth-day evening, the 13th ult., with Scripture reading and prayer service, followed by a very interesting and deep address on "The Judgment," by A. Knight.

On Sixth-day morning, the prayer service was followed by a paper on "The Ten Commandments," by Wm. P. Haworth. In the afternoon the subject, "What are the essential features of our message to the world?" was opened by Elisha Janeway, Haddam, Kan. Symposium—"What has the Gospel of Christ done for me?" was responded to by nearly all present. At 4 P. M. the meeting on Ministry and Oversight convened. At the evening service, Wm. P. Haworth gave a Gospel temperance sermon. On Seventh-day the regular session of the quarterly meeting was held in unity of the Spirit. Seventh-day evening, at the Foreign Mission meeting, Bernice Benson read a paper on "The past, present and future of Friends Missions," followed by a call for missionary money, by A. Knight; which was responded to by a $10 collection. The only visiting minister was Elisha Janeway, Haddam, Kan.

Arthur Jones, Tonganoxie, Kan., at present a student at the Yale Divinity School, held a series of seven meetings, during the winter intermission, at Bolton, Mass. The messages of truth were clear and forceful, the interest throughout excellent, the spiritual life of the members was deepened, and good work accomplished among the indifferent. While Friends have much cause for thankfulness for answered prayers, they still realize there is much to do, and the laborers are few. The following Sabbath, the 13th inst., they had the acceptable attendance and services of James Cooper and wife, Lynn, Mass.

A conference of all the branches of the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia met at Haverford, on Second-day, First month 7th, with Margaretta S. Alsop as chairman. There were 120 persons present. The program was very full and interesting. Many points of mutual benefit were freely and informally discussed. A simple luncheon was served, and after an hour of social intercourse, a short afternoon session was held. The deep spiritual tone of the meeting was felt and shared by all. After a short silence and vocal prayer, the conference closed. The following is a copy of the program with the names of those who led the discussions—

1. How are we to obtain interest in Missions?—Germantown Branch, Rachel C. Reeve.
2. How shall we widen the interest in the whole work of the Association?—Philadelphia Branch, Susan Shipley, Elizabeth Winn, Maria C. Scattergood.
3. How shall we increase the interest in Foreign Missions in our meetings and our homes?—Lansdowne Branch, Olive R. Haviland.

4. The Christian's Attitude toward Foreign Missions.—Haverford Branch, Julia Cope Collins.

The following account of Eliza Yeates appeared in a recent number of the Philadelphia Public Ledger: "Eliza Yeates, an Orthodox Friend, who would have been 100 years old on August 20th, next, died at her home, in Malvern, on Monday night. She was considered a remarkable woman. She was born in Birmingham, Eng., in 1807, and she distinctly remembered the battle of Waterloo. Prior to her fifteenth year she was educated in the home of Herbert Spencer. She studied from the same books with the great philosopher, and their friendship continued until his death. Spencer visited her when he came to this country. After coming to America, in 1850, Eliza Yeates engaged actively in charitable work conducted by the Quakers. She went South with the Union armies in the Civil War, nursing in the field hospitals while perfecting plans for establishing schools for the education of the negroes.

"Eliza Yeates attended a meeting of prominent Friends in this city, where the negro educational project was discussed. The promoters realized that the consent and aid of Secretary of War Stanton must be obtained in order to insure the success of their enterprise, but they despaired of interesting the Secretary at such a time. 'I will interview him,' declared Eliza Yeates.

"She went to Washington, visited Secretary Stanton, and was denied admission. She went again and again, and finally obtained a hearing and succeeded in interesting the Secretary in her mission. Secretary Stanton ordered General Butler, at Fortress Monroe, to supply Eliza Yeates with rations for her schools and charitable work. General Butler always entertained a hearty admiration for the aggressive little Quaker.

"When in her 100th year, Eliza Yeates continued to be keenly interested in public affairs and the financial situation. At the age of 60 years she took out annuities with several life insurance companies, paying each $1,000, which was to return her 10 per cent. annually. Owing to her great age every company has paid her in interest four and five times the amount she originally invested."

WHITE BREAD.

MAKES TROUBLE FOR PEOPLE WITH WEAK
 INTESTINAL DIGESTION.

A lady in a Wisconsin town employed a physician who instructed her not to eat white bread for two years. She tells the details of her sickness and she certainly was a sick woman.

"In the year 1887 I gave out from over work, and until 1901 I remained an invalid in bed a great part of the time. Had different doctors, but nothing seemed to help. I suffered from cerebro-spinal congestion, female trouble and serious stomach and bowel trouble. My husband called a new doctor, and, after having gone without any food for ten days, the doctor ordered Grape-Nuts for me. I could eat the new food from the very first mouthful. The doctor kept me on Grape-Nuts and the only medicine was a little glycerine to heal the alimentary canal.

"When I was up again doctor told me to eat Grape-Nuts twice a day and no white bread for two years. I got well in good time, and have gained in strength so I can do my own work again.

"My brain has been helped so much, and I know that the Grape-Nuts food did this, too. I found I had been made ill because I was not fed right, that is I did not properly digest white bread and some other food I tried to live on.

"I have never been without Grape-Nuts food since and eat it every day. You may publish this letter, if you like, so it will help someone else." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Get the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Nine hundred and fifty-nine persons were killed while traveling on the railroads in the State of New York during the year ending Sixth month last. This seems like a large number, yet, when it is compared with the total number of passengers carried, the proportion is not so great, it being a little more than one in a thousand.

We are likely to find extremes of sentiment manifest in the same locality. Our readers may remember that Indiana reported an unusually large proportion of divorce cases last year. We now find a member of the Legislature introducing a bill creating a Marriage License Board in each county, before which all persons desiring a license must appear and prove to the satisfaction of said board that they are properly qualified to enter the matrimonial state. The test will include the family history of the applicants and also medical examinations.

The New York State Commissioner of Agriculture places the shrinkage in farm values for that commonwealth in the past twenty-five years at $200,000,000—due to the population movement to the cities, and emigration to the West. But he finds that the situation is changing and quite an inquiry springing up from former residents and city people for farms to be devoted to various uses. His department is now following the course of several of the New England States in publishing a catalogue of farms for sale. The present publication contains a list of 2,500 farms with an account of their location, condition and price. This back-to-the-land movement is one to be encouraged.

The past week was unusual, on account of the great destruction of property and life by natural forces. A severe earthquake, probably excelling in extent that of San Francisco or Valparaiso, visited Kingston, on the island of Jamaica. The loss of life far exceeded anything of the kind that has occurred in recent years. A great number of earthquakes sufficiently violent to be felt has visited different countries during the past week; however, no great loss is reported from any other quarter. Heavy rains and snows in the middle West, especially in the Ohio valley, is causing considerable suffering and great damage. Several thousand people have abandoned their homes in Cincinnati and vicinity, the Ohio River being so swollen it left its usual channels and spread over large portions of its valley.

"Bertie Adams Killed Himself Because He Was a Defaulter—Robbed Father's Estate of Securities Worth $70,000." These are the words announcing the tragic end of Robert H. He became passionately fond of gambling on whist, and the winners were not always men. Women of the social set, in which the Congressman was a

WHAT SULPHUR DOES.

FOR THE HUMAN BODY IN HEALTH AND DISEASE.

Costs nothing to try.

The mention of sulphur will recall to many of us the early days when our mothers and grandmothers gave us our daily dose of sulphur and molasses every spring and fall.

It was the universal spring and fall "blood purifier," tonic and cure-all, and, mind you, this old-fashioned remedy was not without merit.

The idea was good, but the remedy was crude and unpalatable, and a large quantity had to be taken to get any effect.

Nowadays we get all the beneficial effects of sulphur in a palatable, concentrated form, so that a single grain is far more effective than a tablespoonful of the crude sulphur.

In recent years research and experiment have proven that the best sulphur for medicinal use is that obtained from Calcium (Calcium Sulphide) and sold in drug stores under the name of Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They are small chocolate coated pellets and contain the active medicinal principle of sulphur in a highly concentrated, effective form.

Few people are aware of the value of this form of sulphur in restoring and maintaining bodily vigor and health; sulphur acts directly on the liver and excretory organs and purifies and enriches the blood by the prompt elimination of waste material.

Our grandmothers knew this when they dosed us with sulphur and molasses every spring and fall, but the crudity and impurity of ordinary flowers of sulphur were often worse than the disease, and cannot compare with the modern concentrated preparations of sulphur, of which Stuart's Calcium Wafers are undoubtedly the best and most widely used.

They are the natural antidote for liver and kidney troubles and cure constipation and purify the blood in a way that often surprises patient and physician alike.

Dr. R. M. Wilkins, while experimenting with sulphur remedies, soon found that the sulphur from Calcium was superior to any other form. He says: "For liver, kidney and blood troubles, especially when resulting from constipation or malaria, I have been surprised at the results obtained from Stuart's Calcium Wafers. In patients suffering from boils and pimples, and even deep-seated carbuncles, I have repeatedly seen them dry up and disappear in four or five days, leaving the skin clear and smooth. Although Stuart's Calcium Wafers are a proprietary article and sold by druggists, and for that reason tabooed by many physicians, yet I know of nothing so safe and reliable for constipation, liver and kidney troubles, and especially in all forms of skin disease, as this remedy."

favorite, were among those to gain by his losses. The mental condition of any one who commits suicide must be too terrible for words, and when a tragedy like this occurs we are inclined to think of the suicide, but those who find themselves responsible for his mental condition must be very dull, indeed, to a sense of moral obligation to persist in practises which they know must destroy the peace of mind and possibly the fortunes and lives of those who indulge with them.

District Attorney Jerome is conducting an active campaign in behalf of a new law prohibiting all horse racing in the State of New York. The ministers of the different denominations in the "National Federation of Churches" met last week and enthusiastically endorsed Jerome's efforts. It is likely the church members of New York State will take a decided part in this movement. In commenting upon the situation at Albany, the District Attorney said:

"Those fellows up there are dead scared of the Methodists and Baptists, and if those two churches get to work this bill will pass. As for the Presbyterians and Episcopalians, they are not afraid of them very much. It's the Baptists and Methodists they are watching. August Belmont and those people who run the race tracks would not go across the street to see a race if there was no betting at the tracks. The fact is nobody would go."

Again the spectacular heroic has been brought prominently before the eyes of the public by the annual distribution of the Carnegie Hero Fund. A sailor, who rescued six men, receives the first prize; a boy, who rescued a companion from drowning, receives the second prize; another boy, who rescued his companion from the same fate, is another, and a man, who snatched a child from the railroad track just as a locomotive dashed by, is a fourth, and so the list continues. It is to be hoped that the money bestowed upon so many young people will find a wholesome use, but a subtle danger seems to lurk in this artificial stimulus which momentary deeds of bravery and endurance receive. In the first place, the truly heroic is likely to be overlooked, for, after all, it is the constant plodding of every day life and the courage with which ordinary things are met, that stamps a person as a true hero rather than a momentary deed of valor. Then, again, a deed in which valor is a motive is cheapened when it is rewarded with a bronzed medal or money.

A service pension act seems likely to become a law. It will include about 148,000 men, whose names are already on the pension roll, and an unknown number of veterans who are not now receiving benefits from the Government. It is estimated that it will take $15,000,000 annually to meet the requirements of the law. It is proposed to give all Union soldiers of the Civil War, and those of the war with Spain, over the age of sixty-two, $12 a month; those over seventy, $15 a month, and those over seventy-five, $20 a month. Service pensions are not a new feature of war expense; similar provisions were made for the veterans of the Revolutionary War, and also of the War of 1812, but we are not quite clear how this policy can be justified. Just why an able-bodied man, who has served ninety days in the G. A. R. some ten or forty years ago, for which he was paid at that time, should now receive from $12 to $20 a month because of that service, while his brother, who stayed at home with his poor father or mother and possibly underwent more hardships in behalf of his country than the more adventurous son, should receive nothing at all, does not quite square with our way of thinking. We believe the Government should pay its employees ample wages for services rendered; we believe, also, that it should take care of those disabled in its service. We heartily favor a service pension for old employees who have spent their life in the Government's employ, but we are not ready to subscribe to a service pension for those who had only a brief connection with the Government in years long past unless the privilege can be extended to a larger class. The distribution of pensions to elderly citizens is not what we object to; it is the fact that it is given to a special class for reasons, which seem to us remote and unjustifiable.

WHY HE WASN'T A LAWYER.

Sir Henry Irving was at one time a witness in a case of street robbery. He had seen a sneak-thief make off with a girl's pocketbook, and he consented to appear as a witness for the girl.

The thief's lawyer was of the type that roars and rants at witnesses, and attempts to break them down. He tried this method on the distinguished actor.

"And at what hour, sir, did this happen?" asked the lawyer.

"I think—," began Sir Henry, when the lawyer interrupted with:

"It isn't what you think, sir; it's what you know that we want!"

"Don't you want to know what I think?" mildly asked the actor.

"I do not," the lawyer snapped out.

"Well, then," said Sir Henry, "I might as well leave the witness-box. I can't talk without thinking. I'm not a lawyer."

"There's a colored man and his wife at the door looking for work."

"But I only advertised for a laundress."

A DOCTOR'S SLEEP.

FOUND HE HAD TO LEAVE OFF COFFEE.

Many persons do not realize that a bad stomach will cause insomnia.

Coffee drinking, being such an ancient and respectable form of stimulation, few realize that the drug—caffeine—contained in coffee and tea, is one of the principal causes of dyspepsia and nervous troubles.

Without their usual portion of coffee or tea, the caffeine tapers are nervous, irritable and fretful. That's the way with a whiskey drinker. He has got to have his dram "to settle his nerves"—habit.

To leave off coffee is an easy matter if you want to try it, because Postum—well boiled according to directions—gives a gentle, but natural support to the nerves and does not contain any drug—nothing but food.

Physicians know this to be true, as one from Georgia writes:

"I have cured myself of a long-standing case of Nervous Dyspepsia by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee," says the doctor.

"I also enjoy refreshing sleep, to which I've been an utter stranger for twenty years.

"In treating Dyspepsia in its various types, I find little trouble when I can induce patients to quit coffee and adopt Postum." The doctor is right, and "there's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Should read the article on Thrift, written by

DR. ORISON SWETT MARDEN, Editor of Success.

This is just an excerpt on

"ANYTHING which will encourage the habit of saving in this extravagant age is a blessing. The temptations on every hand are so alluring that it is very difficult for a young man of ordinary self-control to resist them and to save his money."

"I believe that life-insurance is doing more to induce the habit of saving than almost anything else. I know of nothing which will cover up more blemishes, put out of sight more business weaknesses, cover up more surely the lack of foresight and thrift than a good life-insurance policy. It has proven a friend to thousands who have not been friends to themselves. It has shielded thousands of families who would have been homeless without it; it has sent to college multitudes of boys and girls who but for it would not have gone; it has started thousands of young men in business who, but for it, either would not have started at all, or would have been delayed for years. It has lifted the mortgage from thousands of homes."

This article should be read from start to finish by every young man. The Prudential has published it in pamphlet form and will send a copy free to anyone who will write for it.

Growth

The living stream must flow and flow,
And never rest, and never wait,
But from its bosom, soon or late,
Casts the dead corpse. Time even so,

Runs on and on, and may not rest,
But from its bosom casts away
The cold, dead forms of yesterday—
One best, may not be always best.

That which was but the dream of youth,
Begot of wildest fantasy,
To our old age, perhaps, may be
A good and great and gracious truth.

That which was true in times gone by,
As seen by narrow, ignorant sight,
May in the longer, clearer light
Of wiser times, become a lie.

I hold this truth—whoever wins
Man's highest stature here below,
Must grow, and never cease to grow—
For when growth ceases, death begins.

By ALLEN C. and RICHARD H. THOMAS

This work, revised by Allen C. Thomas, sketches with skill the early settlements of Friends in America, their sufferings, growth, labors and migrations. The accounts of the separations are impartial, and the subsequent history of the different branches is given separately. An entirely new chapter on the "Latest Years" has been added, bringing the work up-to-date. Few histories have been written with more care, and few have more useful information, clearly stated in less space.

AN ORDINARY SAINT—III.

There are many "saints" enrolled in the calendar, "saints" to whom candles are burned and shrines are builded, that have not shed the perfume of love and balm of comfort like this ordinary saint, who has to-day been crowned in the unseen realm.*

The great world never knew her. She did not "post o'er land and ocean" with some panacea for the ills of the race. She did not write books, or lead reforms, or tell mothers how to bring up babies. She was not a leader and she had no "gift" for the propagation of views and theories. But God had given her the highest of all His gifts—He had revealed to her the secret of quietly giving herself to those who needed her. We expect a mother-instinct to come to a woman with her first born, and we are so used to the wonderful thing called mother-love that we do not see the miracle in it.

But this woman had no first born. She never felt the indescribable transformation that comes when the tiny person first babbles, "Mamma, I loves you." And yet she had, by a kind of Divine favor, the mother-instinct and the mother-love without having had the birth pangs. She went into homes where the real mother was missing and entered with a genuine interest into all the little needs and problems of the children's lives.

She could do it because she had so completely learned the supreme secret of giving herself. It is that spirit that makes the great missionary. It is that spirit that makes the great prophet. It is that spirit that flowers out in all the fields of Divine service the world over. She forgot herself in the needs of others, and she did it so spontaneously that she was hardly aware that her life was a life of typical consecration. Like those naive saints in the Judgment scene, she, too, would have said, "When saw we thee hungry and fed thee, or sick and ministered to thee?" But her whole life was spent giving cups of cold water to little ones that needed the drink and the love that went with it.

One of the most beautiful services of her life was her devotion to a little group of young men, who had been patients in an insane asylum and who, during their convalescence, came under her care. They recognized her worth and her goodness with an unerring insight, and there was a soothing, healing power in her love and care, which was better than any medicine in the world. It was a sight one could not forget to see her among these men of many types and many dispositions, showing that same spirit of self-giving which had made her so successful in moulding the lives of children—showing in unpromising soil the pure flower of a saintly life.

Few persons have ever been called to pass through a harder baptism of pain than this soul has come through. All the agony that a human frame can endure came to her. If ever anybody could earn a crown of life through suffering, her claim would be a good one. But she had no such claim, she lived in no such expectation. She was a disciple of the holy Galilean. Her life was in His life, and His life in her life. She preached a great gospel, though it was in deeds rather than in words, in the spirit of her life rather than in phrases. In the "welcome" to her out of pain into joy, out of struggle into peace, there will mingle some children's voices with the sweet voice of the dear Lord.

A SYMPTOM AND A PROTEST.

THREE CENTURIES have passed since Europeans made their first permanent settlement in America at Jamestown, Virginia, and our nation has decided to commemorate the event by an "Exposition" from Fourth month, 26th to Eleventh month, 30th. Various exhibits will be given for the instruction and entertainment of visitors from all parts of the world, and especially from our own country. The original program was designed for "emphasizing the great historical events that have marked the progress of America from its first settlement," also "to exhibit American skill and art," and incidentally to have "a military, naval and marine celebration," and $200,000 was appropriated by Congress to further the project. Since Sixth month, last, this program has been changed and the primary object of the exposition is now announced as "a great international, naval and military assembly, inaugurated and controlled by the United States." According to the official organ of the exposition, among other things, it is to be "the greatest military spectacle the world has ever seen," "a great living picture of war with all its enticing splendors." Congress has increased its appropriation seven and a half times the original amount; more than the original appropriation now being applied to the military features alone. Ten thousand dollars is to be spent for the reproduction of the battle of the "Monitor" and "Merrimac" on Hampton Roads.

We have no thought of being able to alter a single item in this program, but it is worth while to call attention to the affair as a symptom of the growing spirit of militarism among the American people, and as an occasion which will foster and encourage the spirit of war. Against this we make our protest. The whole proceeding is out of harmony with true progress and contrary to the wish and best judgment of a large number of our best citizens. Our former expositions, of which we have had a number of good ones, have been occasions when our own people and visitors from other countries could see the achievements which American brains and brawn had wrought out for the advancement of science, art and industry—real contributions to the well-being of mankind, the advancement of the race, and the elevation of standards of living. But for this, we are now to substitute cheap pagentry, the pomp of parade, and the show of engines of destruction. Such a change is a backward step, a disgrace to our country, a blot upon our so-called Christian civilization.

If there is one event in our history which should be passed over in silence and forgotten, it is the battle of the "Monitor" and the "Merrimac." Doubtless, it was one of the most picturesque and decisive battles in our Civil War, but why should we wish to recall for the entertainment of a curious public one of the saddest mistakes in our national life? Many may believe that the Civil War was a necessity, but, viewed in the light of future events, it was certainly something which every true American sincerely regrets.

While on a recent visit to Washington we were walking through the Capitol and our guide stopped before the bust of Charles Sumner long enough to say, "Upon the initiation of this man every token of the Civil War was removed from the Capitol building save one." Here was a man who wished to cover our national shame, but others would have at least one memento of the dark tragedy, and this memento is a painting of the "Merrimac and Monitor." Our greatest Americans, both men and women, who, by their genius and valor, have endeared themselves to our people, are represented in these halls, but none challenged our respect and admiration more than Sumner. We could not help feeling that even this act would cause his name to be remembered and revered more and more as the years pass, and that some day a grateful nation would render him due thanks for the deed. How revolting is the contrast with a sham battle of this terrible war played for the gratification of a perverted taste.

GAINS IN THE CHURCHES OF THE UNITED STATES IN 1906.

It has for many years been our custom during this month of the year to give a review of the religious situation in America. Basing our position on the census of churches made by H. K. Carroll in The Christian Advocate, it gives one much hope and inspiration to find that there have been net gains in the Christian Churches of America during the year of 870,000 members, which is more than 100,000 in excess of the gains of the year before. Those who are accustomed to suppose that Christianity is losing force, or is a waning factor in the life of this country, will hardly find much support for their view in the actual figures which have been gathered. There are 4,300 more ministers at work to spread the Gospel in the United States than there were one year ago, and there are 3,600 more churches, centers of spiritual life.

The greatest gains have been, as one would expect, in the Roman Catholic Church. Its net gain is 125,000 members, but the gain of the Methodists is very close to it, being 116,000, and the Lutherans have made the same actual gain as the Methodists, so that these two denominations have far outstripped the Roman Catholic Church in total additions to membership. The Baptists, as usual, have been very successful in increasing their numbers and their total gain is 93,000 members.

One lamentable fact meets one at every turn in studying these figures, and that is the enormous divisions which exist among nearly all the Protestant denominations. There are 17 kinds of Methodists, 23 kinds of Lutherans, 14 kinds of Baptists, and 12 kinds of Presbyterians. Fortunately, it is the tendency of the times for the differences in these denominations to be minimized, and all bodies of Christian believers are drawing nearer to each other. We believe they are all getting a clearer vision of their mission in the world. It is an interesting fact that the evangelical denominations that realize the call of the minister to preach the gospel of salvation to men are the ones that are gaining most in numbers and power.

When we are inclined to take a discouraged view of the power of Christianity let us reflect upon the fact that there are in this country of ours more than 32,000,000 professing Christians. It would be a comfort if they all saw the full meaning of the religion they profess and if they all lived in the power of it, but, as of old, there are verily many who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, and who are flinging their lives with great power and consecration into the spiritual tasks of the world.

The little group of Friends aggregating near 118,000 in this enormous total seems like a feeble folk in numbers, but we may well remember the declaration of our founder that "one man in the power of God can shake the country for ten miles around," and if we are faithful to our heritage the 118,000 Friends may become a very powerful factor in renewing the spiritual life of the world.

The course will also be given at Friends' University, Wichita, Kansas; at Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, and Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana.

I WOULD KNOW MORE ABOUT JESUS.

I would know more about Jesus,
I would know more of His love,
More of the Friend of the sinner,
More of His wonderful love.

I would know more of the story
Lovely and precious to me,
Muse of the story of Jesus,
Suff'ring on Calvary's tree.

I would know more of the Saviour's
Blessed salvation so free,
Jesus, the gracious Redeemer,
Dying, yet living for me.

I would know more about Jesus,
More of my King and my Lord,
More of His blessed redemption,
More of His comforting Word.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING OF THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

J. LINDLEY SPICER.

Organization.

The New York Yearly Meeting was organized in 1695.

In 1906 there were nine quarterly meetings, 23 monthly meetings, 44 particular meetings, 51 Bible schools and missions, and 38 Christian Endeavor Societies. The total membership, as reported in 1906, was 3,415, being a net gain of 95 during the year.

Six hundred and forty-four members are under twenty-one years of age; 1,009 are non-resident members. There were 30 births, 90 requests for membership, and 73 received by letter or certificate. The total losses were 127. Forty-one members attended schools under the care of Friends.

The Yearly Meeting is an incorporated body, and has in trust funds to the sum of $228,077.10. The amount directed to be raised by quota for the Yearly Meeting expenses was $1,500.

The total membership of the Bible schools was 3,058. Two new schools and 148 new scholars were secured during the year. Nine hundred and forty-eight members of the schools are also members of the Society of Friends. It is interesting to note that each member is assisting to hold two persons in the Bible schools who do not belong to the Society. But it is sad that fully one-half of the resident membership of the meetings does not belong to the Bible schools. There were 62 conversions reported in the Bible schools, all of whom united with the Society. Could any better commentary be given as to the importance to the Church of this branch of service? The Bible schools report having raised during the year for all purposes $2,457.45.

The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor had 1,147 members. They report six new societies and 315 new members, of whom 168 are juniors. Forty-four have confessed Christ, and 31 Endeavorers united with the Society of Friends during 1906. $1,368 was raised by the societies for foreign missionary work alone, one society of 24 members raising the gratifying amount of $610 for foreign work.

Organized Committees.

The following named standing committees have the oversight and care of the various interests of the meeting, as their name will designate:

"The Bible School Board."

"Board of Home and Foreign Missions."

"Trustees of Oakwood Seminary" (The Yearly Meeting Boarding School, at Union Springs, N. Y.).

"Peace and Arbitration Committee."

"Evangelistic and Church Extension Committee."

"Temperance Committee."

"Book and Tract Committee."

"Murray Fund."

"Mosher Fund."

"Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor."

"Women's Foreign Missionary Society."

"Committee to encourage the study of the History, Literature and Doctrines of Friends."

"Committee on Joint Records." [The valuable records of both branches being kept in fire-proof safe in Fifteenth Street.]

Equipment.

There are 47 meeting houses and 12 ministers' homes. Four meeting houses are in places where there are very few Friends, and meetings are occasionally held. In one thriving village the Friends rent the "church" they use, for meetings, Bible school, Christian Endeavor and prayer meetings. Some communities that were strongholds of Quakerism a quarter of a century ago have been completely changed, by death of leading Friends, removals, and the coming in of two classes of people, neither of which are attracted toward our Society. The first is the millionaire, who pays exorbitant prices for land to add to a vast estate. The other is the ignorant alien, who buys the neglected farms to turn into wineries.

Between the above-mentioned extremes are many self-respecting, though poor, tenants—not members—who are glad, indeed, to come into a community where they can attend Friends' meetings and send their children to the Bible schools.

In one country meeting 50 who formerly attended meeting have died or moved away within the past five years. Other sections have changed from prosperous well-sustained Friends' meetings to extremely difficult mission fields. There being no resident ministers, and but few Friends, most of whom are of advanced years, but meager pastoral support is assured, and those who engage in these fields as pastors take up their work—of necessity—in the same spirit of self-denial, in answer to the call of God, that prompts the missionary entering the foreign field. In fact, some of our pastors, if employed in their avocations, could quadruple their present salaries.

Four of our meetings are held in cities, viz.: New York, Brooklyn, Poughkeepsie and Glens Falls. Twenty meetings are held in small villages, and the same number are in country districts, or just outside of ready access from populous centres.

The yearly meeting is held successively in three cities, viz.: this year, 1907, in Glens Falls; 1908, in Poughkeepsie; 1909, in New York City. By this plan more people are able to avail themselves of the advantage of attendance.

Ministry and Oversight.

We have 70 ministers, 90 elders, and 100 overseers. Of these 24 are serving as both elders and overseers; so that the total membership of the meeting of ministry and oversight is 236.

Of the 70 ministers eight are non-resident; 23 are regarded as pastors—those who are partially or wholly supported by the meeting—and give most of their time to the work of the Church.

In five meetings they have two pastors each—four, husband and wife, and one, a mother and daughter, each of whom are ministers. Sixteen resident ministers take active part in vocal ministry in their own meetings, and largely maintain them that support themselves. Nine ministers assist in various meetings from time to time by special appointment and as local supply. Seventeen ministers take little or no responsibility regarding the meetings, and very rarely exercise their gift. Five Christian workers, not recorded ministers, act as ministers in various meetings. One particular meeting has nine ministers in its membership, another eight, another seven. Four meetings are without pastors, resident ministers, or supply. Two meetings are supplied by ministers of other denominations. Nine ministers engage in special evangelistic service when the way opens. Four pastors have two meetings each, some miles apart. Three pastors are members of another yearly meeting. Three ministers are missionaries in China.

One quarterly meeting, consisting of three particular meetings, is located in the State of Vermont. A former meeting, held in Canada, has been laid down.

Home and Foreign Missions.

In China: Margaret A. Holmes, George Fox DeVol, M.D., and Robert L. Simkin, all of whom are ministers of the Gospel, are laboring in China, the last named having gone out under the care of English Friends, New York Yearly Meeting bearing a liberal share of the expenses.

The Murray Fund provided a medical library for the new hospital just erected in Luh Hoh, China, by Dr. De Vol. Many Friends have contributed largely toward the erection of the above hospital.

In Africa: Friends' African Industrial Mission receives substantial support, both in money and faithful service in the board of management.

In Mexico: More than $2,000, annually, is expended in support of "Penn Institute," Vactoria, Mexico, and gratifying results are reported.

In Cuba: Material aid has been rendered by personal contributions of cash and supplies of building material.

The Indians have been assisted through contributions to "The Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs."

The Negroes: "The High-Point Normal and Industrial School," in North Carolina, calls for an annual outlay of thousands of dollars. Three hundred and ninety-eight students have been accorded the privileges of becoming better fitted for useful lives during the year. Work in Arkansas, Virginia, and in the New York Colored Mission, has also claimed intelligent attention in the effort to uplift this race.

267 members in six auxiliaries. They raised nearly $800 last year for work in Japan, India, China and Palestine.

In the more distinctive home field, the Twenty-first Ward Industrial Mission, in New York City, is a valued adjunct in helping children and young people to help themselves. The Chinese Mission, in Brooklyn, has brought several to confess Christ, and some have joined Friends. An active "adult school," after the plan so successfully followed in London Yearly Meeting, is conducted upon First-day mornings, at Twentieth Street, New York. On Sixth-day evening a prayer meeting, held by Armenians, is a new and promising feature of Christian effort. Jews, Swiss, Turks and Poles attend our meetings and show much interest.

The prison evangelist of the W. C. T. U. for the State, is a Friend minister. The president of the Board of Managers of "The New York State Reformatory for Women" and "The Westchester Temporary Home for Destitute Children" is also a Friend minister.

The American and New York Bible Society, the New York State Sunday-school Association, the Bible and Fruit Mission, insane and blind asylums, old ladies' and children's homes, mission schools, working girls' clubs, the King's Daughters, prison and jail visiting, and various other philanthropic organizations or lines of service, are heartily assisted by Friends.

Educational.

The Yearly Meeting Boarding School is situated in western New York, upon the shores of beautiful Cayuga Lake, at Union Springs. Oakwood Seminary has an endowment of $100,000 and is well equipped. The principal and some of the teachers are members of our yearly meeting. They are assisted by a competent corps of graduates from Friends' colleges.

Members of our yearly meeting are now in attendance at Earlham, Penn and Haverford Colleges.

"Friends' Book and Tract Committee" and the committees having charge of the "H. H. Mosher" and "Murray Funds" assist in supplying needed books to ministers and workers. Thirty-six lectures, upon a wide range of topics, are offered by volunteer members to any meeting that will pay traveling expenses. This friendly interchange has been a means of greatly increased interest and attendance at quarterly meeting conferences. Thousands of a little folder, entitled "What Friends Believe," have been distributed by the "Mosher Fund" Committee. "The Study of the History, Literature and Doctrines of Friends" is taking a foremost place, and organization of "Quakerism classes" encouraged. Several public meetings have been held in churches of other denominations, and some parlor meetings inaugurated, where the message of Friends has been presented by members of our Society. Circulating libraries are being collected by gifts of books to be loaned to Bible schools for several months, then forwarded to another point. A four-year course of memory work, called The Bible Study League, has been successfully progressing in some of our Bible schools, and the "Organized Classes" and "Home Department" work extended.

To present a clear knowledge of the work of the yearly meeting in its varied interests, the superintendent is prepared to spend six days with each meeting desiring this service. Upon First-day he attends the morning meeting for worship; in the afternoon, holds a meeting for men only; in the evening, holds a "Bible school conference;" Second-day, gives an object talk on "Temperance;" Third-day, speaks upon "Doctrines and Practices of the Society of Friends;" Fourth-day, upon "The Victories of Peace;" Fifth-day, tells of "Friends' Missionary Work at Home and Abroad;" Sixth-day, holds a junior rally or children's meeting at 4 o'clock P. M., and gives an object lesson to Endeavorers in the evening upon "The Finished Products of Christian Endeavor." Upon Seventh-day he journeys to meet the next appointment. A school for Christian workers is held for two days, preceeding yearly meeting, for which competent lecturers and instructors are secured.

Evangelization.

All our effort in the various lines mentioned centre here. Organization, equipment, missionary effort, and education, each in their measure and all unitedly, should result in evangelization.

Our problems are doubtless much the same as those of other yearly meetings, yet they seem at times to baffle all attempts toward a wise solution.

A broader education and a more general intelligence demands a better ministry, a readjustment of methods, skilled Bible school teachers, and leaders who combine spiritual fervor with business sense and intellectual attainment. We have no adequate provision for the development of such leaders, and the financial support is inadequate to secure those we need.

City residents who remove to suburban homes are eagerly sought out, and pressed into religious work in other churches. This offers social standing, congenial service, and they become attached to the pleasant associations in the new environment. On the other hand, country Friends remove to villages where there are no Friends' meeting. Amid the better social and educational privileges, their children join other churches.

We are conscious that a large share of our philanthropic work, while it helps the individuals to a broader view of life and a recognition of the Divine purpose, it does not bring into our denominational fellowship, and does not strengthen our branch of the Church.

Special evangelistic services and series of meetings are held in the various fields. We do not employ the high-priced professional evangelist, but, by a pleasant interchange of helpful service, use our own pastors and ministers as they may discern the leading of the Spirit, and way opens.

We recognize the value of an efficiently organized Pastoral Committee that is made up of the ministers, elders, overseers, and such others, as the monthly meetings may select. This body of concerned Friends have the general oversight of the entire meeting, and may influence to a continuous work of strengthening, instructing, and ingathering, more desirable and edifying than spasmodic effort. Five thousand two hundred and forty-six pastoral visits were reported as made by these committees last year.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

CHRISTIANITY—THE PRACTICAL LIFE.

BY R. ARNOLD RICKS, JR.

At the present, and probably more so than ever before, it is difficult to get people interested in a thing sufficiently to induce them to become workers—unless it is shown to be entirely practical.

The question then arises, ought not Christianity to be regarded in this sense? While it is questionable, whether or no, it would be well to obliterate, even if possible, the mysterious and obscure parts of religion; yet it seems that too often it is looked upon in this sense. It is thought of as something very hard to understand. It seems, at present, that the best way of making it more attractive and appealing, is to emphasize the fact, in a logical way, that it is practical to the utmost degree.

There are several ways of evincing this fact, but there is one that seems peculiarly applicable, and the gist of it is contained in the phrase—the necessity of living the Moral Life from childhood until death.

In order to show the practical side, as well as the necessity of living such a life, it will be well to begin by drawing a few lessons from some of the dumb animals. It is interesting and instructive to go into the forest in the fall of the year, and watch the little squirrel storing up nuts for food during the coming winter. While it probably is not laying up anything for future years, with the exception of strength, yet it teaches us the very important lesson of looking ahead. The storing up of honey by the bee and the migration of birds are other vindications of, probably not far-sightedness, but fore-sightedness. Or, if you would have an example from nature, just think, for a moment, of how the sap leaves the trunk and branches of a tree, where it would be frozen by the winter's cold, and seeks shelter and protection deep down in the ground.

All of these examples point to something ahead, and not less conspicuous is the planting and harvesting of crops by the farmers, or the investment of money by the financiers. In such cases there is far-sightedness of some kind, because they are looking into the vague, distant distance and providing a means of subsistence. In fact, it is patent enough, that it is absolutely necessary for humanity—to which we will narrow our consideration,—to provide now for something to live on in the future.

Thus far, we have only seen how it is necessary to have a means of subsistence pre-arranged, but we have omitted the clause,—in order to have strength and good health,—because a larger, broader element must be introduced in order to make such a statement valuable. This element is nothing other than a strong character, and it is this point that is the pivot on which the “fly-wheel of society turns.” It is necessary to build up a strong, well-rounded character in order to preserve strength and health. A boy or a young man cannot afford to waste his strength, his nerves, his vivacity, his mind; in short, his character, by the use of liquors or tobacco, nor can he afford to blur his character by the use of reckless language, or any other bad habit. In other words, it is just as imperative for a young person to look forward and plan for sustenance for character, as it is towards furnishing food for the body, because after securing bodily subsistence, while recklessly wasting one's life, death or ill health is liable to deprive one of the pleasure of it.

In objection to this thought, there are people who would cite a large number of persons who have strength and health, and yet have led a loose, indefinite life. But, to this objection, a simple answer instantly arises. There is no standard of human strength or health. Those persons who have led a wild life, would undoubtedly be stronger if they had not done so. To waste time on proving the evil that bad habits do would be folly, because it is too apparent every day.

Robert Green, the English dramatist, who helped shape Shakespeare's style of writing, after spending a life of recklessness and shame, on his death bed, and while going through the pangs of remorse and the throes of a stricken conscience, expressed the keynote that should be a sufficient warning to every one, in these lines—

“Time loosely spent, can never again be won,

My time is loosely spent, and I undone.”

It was stated in the beginning, that it was necessary to live a moral life, and it is hoped that it has been made clear in a brief way, not only the necessity of it, but the practicability of it.

But the question might be asked, haven't we been arguing from a Hedonistic point of view? To a certain extent, we have. But we used the expression, well-rounded character, and this necessitates “none of self and all of thee.”

We now come to the crucial point. The point that has drawn forth this discussion. We have observed why it is necessary to live the Moral Life, and we have seen the practicability of it. Now apply the teachings of Christianity to every thought herein expressed, or any other unexpressed, that is in the realm of the Moral life, and notice how well they fit. They are in accord with every principle. Then, can we not rightly call Christianity practical, and would it not be more appealing if presented more frequently from the practical point of view?

But Christianity goes a step farther in its practicableness. It is larger, richer, and more sufficient than the Moral Life. It furnishes the one thing, that from time immemorial has retained a place in the human mind. It furnishes a leader, and, of course, this leader is Jesus Christ. It is innate in a human being to look up to someone, whom they consider nearest their ideal; to follow a leader. What would the great mass of society do, if there were not leaders to guide and direct? What would these leaders do, if they were not guided by other leaders, living or dead, as their example? And what would the great army of God do, if they did not have a leader; a perfect leader?

Martin Luther struck the chord that is in harmony with the above thought, when, in his famous hymn, "A Mighty Fortress is Our God," he composed the following lines—

"Did we in ourselves confide, our striving would be losing,
Were not the right man on our side, the man of God's own choosing;
Doth ask who this may be? Christ Jesus it is He;
From age to age the same, And He must win the battle."

Looked at in such a manner, it certainly seems as though the religion that was planted by Christ and watered by Paul and the other Apostles, ought to appeal to and convert any human being of ordinary judgment.

"THE INCUBATOR BABY."

We were recently greatly amused in reading a brief book, bearing the above title,—a very clever satire on some of our modern tendencies. Margery was a wee baby, brought up in the glass case of an incubator, commencing life on one pound and eight ounces of physical organism, but growing rapidly under scientific treatment. When she was taken home, she found that her mamma was a very busy woman, believed in the "broad life" for her sex, and contended that she would not be a slave to the home. Margery did not care much for the broad life herself. As her biographer said, "She wanted to be fed when she was hungry, and sleep whenever she was sleepy, and to be loved and mothered and petted whenever she was not hungry nor sleepy, and whatever a nickel-plated incubator might be able to do, it is not an adept at kissing. It may exude a balmy temperature better than an old-fashioned fireplace, but it is a failure at wrapping its warm, soft arms around a baby, and pressing its cheek against a tiny, satin cheek."

At Margery's home there was no incubator, but there were charts, and sterilizers, and scales, and thermometers to test degrees of temperature and respirations. There was a trained nurse, and a secretary, who had a filing cabinet with cards for sleep records, weight records, temperature, respiration, and pulse records, so that Margery was analyzed and specified down to the last atom. The mother was aided in her care of the baby by a committee, composed of representatives from the Browning Club, the Higher Life Circle, the Physical Good Guild, and the Mothers' Club. The committee met daily to adopt rules and regulations, and spent hours over the card cabinet. The mother went off to conventions, and, meanwhile, Margery proceeded to break the whole constitution and by-laws. She sat on the floor, and imbibed germs, and did all sorts of unscientific things. Meanwhile, the nurse and the secretary were in a conspiracy against scientific motherhood, and got the father drawn into their plans.

But, finally, measles catching the baby, the mother left a convention just as she was about to read a paper on "Scientific Motherhood," and hastened home. We need not detail the conclusion. The father, the mother, the trained nurse, the secretary, the Club Committee, were all conquered by that baby, who insisted on being loved and jollied, and having a good time, irrespective of committees or rules. As the old doctor, who was called in to look at the baby, said: "I prescribe one grandmother; one good, old-fashioned grandmother. See that she is not any new-fangled affair, either, or I will turn her out and go out on the street and pick out one to suit me. An incubator is all right when a mother won't do, and a mother is all right when you can't get a grandmother, but hang your committees and your rules. The only good thing about rules is to find exceptions to them."—Western Christian Advocate.

JACOB AND RUTH BALES.

Jacob Bales was born in Washington County, Eastern Tennessee, First month 16, 1812. Died Fourth month 22, 1906, aged 94 years, 3 months.

He and Ruth Morgan were married, according to Friends' ceremony, at Lost Creek, Tenn., 1838, and lived together nearly sixty-three years, when she was called Home in 1900, in her 82d year.

In the fall of 1860 they moved to what was then Kansas Territory, stopping through the winter at Spring Dale, and from there to Emporia, in 1861. What is now Emporia Monthly Meeting was organized in their house and held there for a few months. Their quarterly meeting at that time was Bear Creek, Iowa. Ere long, quarterly meetings were organized in Kansas, which required committees to travel long distances, by private conveyances, mostly in farm wagons. Jacob and Ruth Bales did their share, always ready to give time and means for the good of the Church.

They were members of Spring Dale, Cotton Wood, Toledo, Hesper and Lawrence Monthly Meetings, in all of which they acceptably filled the station of elders for more than fifty years.

When living 300 miles from their yearly meeting, they were careful to attend, making the journey in a private conveyance. At one time they took their eleven-months-old baby with them on horse-back. They were usually at their place of worship, when in health.

"Traveling Friends" were always welcome in their hospitable home, and often they took them from one meeting to another.

When the awakening came to Kansas Friends they prayerfully moved forward as they believed the Lord was leading, and their testimonies were often heard in public meetings. Their every-day life was a benediction to those who were associated with them. The stranger, the bereaved and the sick were especially remembered with a visit and tokens of kindness. All

FATHER OR FATE.

Our attitude towards God determines our attitude towards life. If we trust him as a Father, then life with all its changes is not dark or tangled, but is only the changing expression of his fatherhood. A father who was watching by the bedside of his little girl, whose life hung in the balances in a lingering illness, said to a friend: "I am getting comfort just now from something that Maltbie D. Babcock said,—'God is either father or fate, and there is only one answer to that question.'" There was, indeed, only one answer in the thought of that trusting, grieving man, but if his consciousness of God as father had been less keen, his attitude towards the possible loss of his child would have cast a shadow across the whole of life for him and his friends. If we hold to the fatherhood of God, we shall not let go of the blessed consciousness that life is good.

SECOND MONTH 10, 1907.

ABRAM CALLED TO A BLESSING.

Genesis 12: 1-8.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing. Gen. 12: 2.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Second mo. 4.—Abram called to be a blessing. Gen. 12: 1-8.

Third-day, Second mo. 5.—God's gift to Abram. Gen. 13: 14-18.

Fourth-day, Second mo. 6.—The promise confirmed. Gen. 15: 1-7.

Fifth-day, Second mo. 7.—Called out. Acts 7: 1-7.

Sixth-day, Second mo. 8.—Faithful Abraham. Gal. 3: 6-11.

Seventh-day, Second mo. 9.—Leaving all for Christ. Mark 10: 28-31.

First-day, Second mo. 10.—Faith and obedience. Heb. 11: 6-12.

Time.—It is still impossible to fix the date of Abraham. He was possibly contemporary with Hammurabi, whose code of laws has been recently discovered, and who is supposed to have flourished some period between 2000 and 2300, B. C. If this is so, 2250 B. C. may be given as an approximate date for Abraham's birth. But at best, with our present knowledge, any date must be conjectural to a high degree.

Place.—"Ur of the Chaldees," from which, it is said, Abram went forth, was a city about 6 miles south of the Euphrates, and about 125 miles from its present mouth. Ur was an important city long before Babylon, and originally the river was near its gates. The ruins of this city are now in process of excavation.

There is a decided change in the narrative at the beginning of the twelfth chapter; heretofore the attention has been given to general topics rather than particulars; now, the attention is concentrated on an individual. Abram, later Abraham, is a splendid character, a man fulfilling the ideal of the narrator, as the founder of a great people. It should be noted that the account does not profess to be a complete biography, for long periods are omitted altogether, and only such incidents are selected as would best bring out how God had called, protected, and led the great progenitor of the Hebrews, training him and his successors to be directly and indirectly a blessing to the world.

Here, also, is the beginning of the history of the patriarchs, with whose history and that of Abraham, the rest of Genesis is taken up. There can hardly be any question that the substance of these narratives is historic. The main object of the narrative is to illustrate the ways of God to men, and it should be studied from that point of view. Chapter 11, verses 27-32 should be read. It should be remembered that at the time of Abraham, Babylonia was highly civilized, as was also Egypt. He must have been familiar with written records, and with the laws and literature of ancient Babylonia. A column engraved with the Laws of Hammurabi was discovered in 1901. These laws resemble those of the Pentateuch in many respects. They date back to 2250 B. C., and were almost without doubt contemporary with Abraham.

The country from which Abraham went out was polytheistic, and Ur appears to have been the center of worship. Like so many of the heathen religions, much immorality prevailed, out of which Abram was called. How he came to be a believer in one God is not related.

1. "Now the Lord said," etc. In continuation of chapter 11. How the communication was made is not told. "Get thee out," etc. The expressions are used cumulatively in order to make the matter emphatic,—how thorough the separation must be.

"Unto the land that I will show thee." He was not told where this land was, and hence his going was an exercise of faith, as the writer of Hebrews (1:8) points out.

2. "The promise given to Abram. To be a great nation, and to have a great name, was the ideal of ancient Oriental nations. To be blessed was well understood, but to be a blessing to others was not understood in the larger sense of Christian teaching. In the writer's mind this latter would apply to descendants of Abraham, or most likely that Abram would be most blessed. Compare Ps. 21:6; Is. 19:24; Zech. 8:13.

3. "I will bless," etc. Abram will be so favored by God that those who are friendly with him will have prosperity, while those who injure him will be visited by misfortune. "In thee," rather "Through thee." This rendering makes the passage imply that the religious privileges of the Hebrews shall in time be extended to all nations, as they are in the process of being now. Compare Is. 2:2, 3; 19:23-25. Others think that passage should read, "should bless themselves," meaning that others seeing what the blessing of Abram means, will desire a similar blessing for themselves. Compare Is. 61:9; 65:23.

4. Abram obeyed without question. "Lot." Son of Nahor. Gen. 11:27. "Sarai." Abram's half sister (Gen. 20:12), afterwards called Sarah, (Gen. 17:15) though a fine character, was, by no means, an ideal one. "The souls." Persons, probably meaning slaves. Compare Gen. 36:6; Ezek. 27:13. "Haran." This was an important place, about 500 miles northwest of Ur, situated on one of the branches or tributaries of the Euphrates. Nothing remains now but some mounds. It is often mentioned in the inscriptions. It was on the principal route from Nineveh to Carchemish at the junction of the road to Damascus. Compare Ezek. 27:23. Like Ur, it was a seat of the worship of the Moon-god.

5. "Any they went forth." The migrations of tribes is thoroughly historical, and that the Hebrews should have had their original home somewhere in Mesopotamia, is what might be expected even if we had not the Biblical narrative. "Canaan." The name was first applied to the coast, then to the valley of the Jordan (Numb. 13:23.), and, finally, to the whole country. "Into the land of Canaan they came." Of course it is impossible to trace Abraham's route with certainty, though the physical conditions of the country, and the persistence of old routes indicate it with considerable probability. These would make the route, cross the Euphrates at Carchemish (60 miles west of Haran), then south, past Hamath and Damascus, then south still, until he entered Canaan west of the Waters of Merom, and so on to Shechem. Or it might be down the valley of the Jordan until reaching the fords, about 25 miles north of the Dead Sea, he would cross where Jacob did years after, and then strike northwest to Shechem.

6. "Unto the oak of Moreh." R. V. The reference is evidently to some sacred tree. Literally, the Terebrinth. Compare Deut. 11:30. "Sichem." Better as in R. V. "Shechem." This was near Mts. Ebal and Gerizim, in Samaria.

7. A promise of the land. Again, a trial of Abram's faith, for the land was possessed by a stalwart people.

8. "Removed." Why is not stated. "Bethel." At that time Luz; afterward named Bethel by Jacob. Gen. 28:19. To build an altar was a regular religious observance in patriarchal times. Gen. 8:20; 22:9; 26:5; 35:7, etc.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Obedience is a necessity of spiritual life and development.

2. "Religion is not a possession to keep, but a blessing to share, a light to diffuse, a life to communicate."

3. One of the greatest privileges in life is to be a blessing to others.

TOPIC FOR SECOND MONTH TENTH, 1907.

LESSONS FROM THE PATRIARCHS.

I. NOAH.

Heb. 11:7; II Pet. 2:4-9; I Pet. 3:17-22.

Second-day, Second mo. 4.—One faithful man. Gen. 6:1-11.
Third-day, Second mo. 5.—The God-taught man. Gen. 6:12-21.
Fourth-day, Second mo. 6.—The obedient man. Gen. 6:22-7:5.
Fifth-day, Second mo. 7.—Religion in the family. Gen. 7:6-8:19.
Sixth-day, Second mo. 8.—Public worship. Gen. 8:20-9:7.
Seventh-day, Second mo. 9.—God's covenant. Gen. 9:8-29.

What we sometimes call "Bible characters" often seem to us to have occupied positions of peculiar favor. Their attainments are looked upon, not so much as patterns for us to imitate, but rather as illustrations of exceptional excellencies or demonstrations of what God could do when He singled out an individual to demonstrate some feature of His power and grace. In doing this we put them too far away to let God reach us through them, though that is just what He desires to do, and the reason why their history has been so marvellously preserved to us.

Our revisions recognize a break in the narrative, or narratives, between verses eight and nine of Gen. 6. Yet the ideas seem very closely related. If Noah found grace in the eyes of Jehovah, it was because of his obedience that led to righteousness. He chose God's companionship and followed so closely that he was perfect according to his opportunity, "faultless," the margin reads. One advantage, perhaps, we may allow to Noah, and that is the long years of personal experience and acquaintanceship which resulted from his faithfulness in choosing and walking with God; but in every other respect we can think of ourselves as having superior privileges. Among these is the history of his own life, which is one of the broken gleams of that light of which Jesus Christ is the fullness.

How Noah stands out as an example of trust in his willingness to devote so many years to the task that God had appointed to him, the task, indeed, of securing his own safety, yet, in the face of all history and of all present indication as suggesting the uselessness of such an action; and then to go before the storm into the ark, with all preparation made, and there await the fulfillment of the strange work. Reason and precedent are worth much, but woe betide the man in whom the clear voice of conscience is stifled by them! To harken and obey are better than all ordinances and received observances, though handed down from a glorious past.

Patience, too, is exemplified, while Noah "keeps sweet" and maintains his status as a faultless "preacher of righteousness," through all the years of his scoffing and rejection. Effort and material and his whole reputation are staked on this single, far-off event. The flippant "Be good and you will be lonesome" was not tossed at him in our modern phrase, but it must have seemed true for the years of waiting, for the heart longs for human sympathy; but he was one who looked not on the things that were seen, but whose eye was on the recompense of reward.

How awful was the lonesomeness of the earth when the one righteous man was shut in and it was left without salt!

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Dear Friend:—Being a constant reader of your valuable paper, I may say that few numbers have impressed me more than No. 2, of Vol. XIV, which bears date of First month 10th, 1907. It is truly a most inspiring number with which to open a new year. Without specifying any one of its various and interesting departments, I will say a word upon what I find immediately after the table of contents, headed "A Great Creed." Friends have sometimes been more careful than seems to me, altogether profitable about the use of the word "creed." If a creed, from credo, I believe, is made a form of belief to which all must subscribe, it is, indeed, dangerous, and much better calculated to prevent than to promote any form of religious development and growth. But in a simple, clear and liberal way, this much abused word may be properly and profitably interpreted. The lives that we all live, our daily and hourly consideration of the needs of those around us, our reproach to the pure, the true, the devoted life of the Master, this is the main thing, and much more important than the form of religious belief which we may individually adopt. Especially, we must not judge one another, for the form of our religious belief for that is largely due to our temperament, and in reality must be a matter of individual concern. What evidence have we in the sacred Scripture of the new dispensation that our Master ever taught a fixed form of our religious belief?

If we must seek for any form of words which we may all follow, let us adopt something simple and all comprehensive. When George Fox uttered so constantly his simple words, "Friends, mind the Light," he certainly meant that we all, individually, must mind the light given us, and that that light, which was given to every individual, should be for his own individual life, and never be applied to the enforcement of it upon another living soul. There would seem to be nothing more simple and comprehensive than a form adopted by a great Christian leader some fifty years ago, who gave as a name to his Church, the Church of the Disciples, a creed that all Christians could surely sign, which was given in these words: "Our faith is in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God, and we hereby form ourselves into a Church of His Disciples, that we may co-operate in the study and practice of Christianity."

Another very simple form of creed, in which we may surely all unite, has been proposed by the present minister in this same Church of the Disciples, which has been lately pronounced by a Methodist bishop as "The motto of the Church of the near future"—it is thus expressed: "In the freedom of truth, and in the Spirit of Jesus Christ, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man."

The more carefully I read THE AMERICAN FRIEND, the more clearly I see that its wisely conducted columns are doing their part to bring about that state of feeling among Friends that will make them all more and more one united organization, and that that body may truly say, in the concluding words of the passage quoted, "A Great Creed," "We want a Savior, human to be approached, divine to be trusted; for only God can save, and He who made us can mend us."

EDWARD H. MAGILL.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

In common with the Friend, whose article, "The Front Pew," appeared in THE AMERICAN FRIEND for First month 17, 1907, I have long felt a concern that our meetings should present a more compact appearance.

Perhaps I feel this more keenly than some others, because much of the time, for many years, I have been deprived of the privilege of social worship.

We would never expect to build a fire, by putting a few sticks in each corner of the grate, but, by placing them so closely together that when one is lighted, it will light the one next to it.

I hope all who have the opportunity will read the article alluded to, and will consider it, and that in the very near future no one may even have the opportunity to see, in a Friends' meeting house, individuals or groups scattered in different corners, but all lovingly gathered near those who are most likely to be handed the bread,—the spiritual nourishment, to distribute. I well remember, as a child, how we used to stand in a circle, holding hands, to take electricity. Certainly no one out of touch got any.

One line of kindergarten exercises seemed to me suggestive in this connection, "Let us love one another all together in a row."

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

The American Friend is very much appreciated by us, and we pray God's blessing upon the effort it is making for Truth.

Very truly,

ZENO H. DOAN.

Willis Bond and Frank Moorman are conducting a series of meetings at Georgetown, Ill.

Gurney Dicks recently held a series of meetings at Lick Creek, the oldest meeting in Western Yearly Meeting.

Zeno H. Doan, who is located at Marshalltown, Iowa, reports the work at that place moving nicely. President E. H. Parisho, of Nebraska Central College, recently held a series of meetings there.

Luke Woodard, Fountain City, Ind., was compelled to abandon a series of meetings which he was holding recently at West Grove, near Deming, Ind., on account of a slight indisposition. He hopes soon to resume active work.

Cyrus Jones of Coloma, Ind., recently spent two weeks in very acceptable service among the meetings of Paoli Monthly Meeting and Western Yearly Meeting. In this meeting he lived and worked all his life until five years ago.

Under the superintendency of John J. Copeland, the Bible school at Paoli, Ind., is doing efficient and aggressive work. Minnie Stout Copeland, wife of the superintendent, is chorister of the school, and has interested and enlisted the young people as never before in the work of the school.

Dr. Hillis is reported to have said in a recent sermon: "Unless God has given a man a message this morning that burns in his bones, a thousand bishops on the outside cannot take the place of the ordaining of God on the inside; and as to the call to the ministry, I am a Quaker through and through."

Charles E. Newlin, of Indianapolis, recently visited the meetings of Blue River Quarter Western Yearly Meeting, under the auspices of the Temperance Committee of the yearly meeting. His addresses were able and well received. His "Message of Quakerism to the Twentieth Century" is a clear, logical and forcible presentation of the duty of Friends on present-day topics.

Report comes to us of a very interesting and helpful quarterly meeting at East Parsonsfield, Maine, on the 11th, 12th and 13th inst. The presence and service of Charles H. Jones were greatly appreciated. East Parsonsfield (Me) and North Sandwich (N. H.) Monthly Meetings comprise this quarterly meeting. The latter has no resident minister, but the field is an open one for Friends.

The Philadelphia Round-table met at the Institute Rooms, 20 South Twelfth Street, the 23d inst. The subject was "Philadelphia Yearly Meeting" (Race Street). A number of young Race Street Friends presented the various activities in which they are most aggressive, i. e., The Bible School, Young Friends' Associations, Philanthropic, and Church Extension. About fifty, from both branches of Friends, were present, manifesting a keen interest in religious work and a good knowledge of meeting affairs.

The Foreign Missionary Association of Friends, of Philadelphia, has passed its twenty-fifth birthday. It has begun the publication of a small quarterly. Hannah W. Cadbury is editor and Julia Cope Collins, assistant. The first number contains an account of the recent reception given by the Laymen's Missionary Movement in Philadelphia, extracts from a letter of M. P. Bowles, an account of the Missionary Conference at Haverford, a letter from Daniel Oliver, and other items of interest.

A correspondent from Greentown, Ind., writes as follows: "By this I wish to inform the readers of your much appreciated paper that Thomas E. Newlin, so well and favorably known in our State as an aggressive defender of the right, delivered his lecture, entitled "The Message of the Society of Friends to the Twentieth Century," at our church, New Hope, Howard Co., Ind., recently, to a full house; his effort was grand, bristling with truth, argument and wisely drawn conclusions, from start to finish. We consider his effort an uplift to our church."

At the monthly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, for the Western District (Twelfth Street, Phila.), held on the 16th inst., four persons were received into membership. Each individual applicant had been separately visited by a committee of the meeting, and the cases deliberately considered.

The oldest member of the meeting remarked that at a time, within his memory, the principal business of the meeting was dealing with offenders and issuing testimonies of disownment, and the reception of a new member was then a rare occurrence. He was rejoiced to notice that the tide had changed, and that now the chief business of the meeting was the consideration of applications for membership, and it was especially gratifying that all of these applications were distinctly on the grounds of conviction.

The following is taken from the Whittier Register, Whittier, Cal.: "The Friends of East Whittier dedicated their new place of worship, known as the Lowell Friends' Church, located about four miles east of Whittier near the Leffingwell rancho, Sunday, January 5th. President C. E. Tebbetts, who has been in charge of the services, opened the meeting with Scripture reading and prayer, after which Andrew Mitchell, pastor of the Friends' Church of Long Beach, preached the dedicatory sermon. At the close of this a subscription was taken which was responded to so generously that in a very few moments two hundred and fifteen dollars was raised, which amount finished paying for the new seats, and entirely cleared the church of all indebtedness. Thomas Armstrong, evangelist, Superintendent of California Yearly Meeting, offered an earnest prayer, formally dedicating the church to the service and worship of God."

Barant Cornelius Larson, whose obituary we publish elsewhere, moved to this country from Norway in 1850, and lived the greater part of the time in Lee County, Iowa. In 1852, he was united in marriage to Gertrude Anderson. Soon after coming to America he united with Friends, and his gift in the ministry was acknowledged. For fourteen years, commencing with 1870, he was engaged in work among the Indians. Although he was employed by the Government, he did not forget that he was an ambassador of the Cross, and did much missionary work. He was blessed in this work and always spoke of it with joy. For a number of years there has not been a Friends' meeting near him, but he did not lose interest in the Society, and kept in touch with the Church through THE AMERICAN FRIEND. The call came suddenly but not unexpectedly, and we have every evidence to believe that he has gone to meet his loved ones and the Saviour, whom he loved and served.

The following is taken from the Advocate of Peace:

The Philadelphia Friends' Peace Association, a very active and earnest organization, has offered a first prize of $40.00, and a second prize of $20.00, for the two best essays to be written by pupils of either the Central High School, Central Manual Training High School, or the North-east Manual Training High School, of Philadelphia, on "International Friendship: Its Recent Growth and Practical Significance." The essays submitted must not exceed three thousand words in length. They must be written on one side of the paper only in ink, or by typewriter. They must be sent without signature, with a sealed envelope containing the name, address, school and class of the writer, to H. W. Cadbury, Secretary, 441 Locust Avenue, Germantown, Penna., not later than March 15, 1907. The essays will be judged by three competent persons, selected by the Executive Committee of the Philadelphia Peace Association of Friends. In arriving at a decision, the judges will be guided chiefly by the clearness and force of the writers in presenting the practical, rather than the theoretical or sentimental, aspects of the subject. The Committee encourage those expecting to contest for the prize to write for suggestions as to the literature of the subject to H. W. Cadbury, Secretary, 441 Locust Avenue, Germantown, Penna., or to Benjamin F. Trueblood, Secretary of the American Peace Society 31 Beacon Street, Boston.

Z. Kirk and wife, and Irving Johnson accompanied the remains to Waynesville, Ohio, where it was interred by the side of her parents and sister. Pres. A. Rosenberger and Levi Mills conducted the funeral service at the home of the deceased's aunt, Susan Haines, Waynesville, Ohio.

Events and Comments.

We are now informed that Andrew Carnegie is to have his name perpetuated in Chicago by a university bearing his name. Chicago is becoming a favorite place for rich men to erect memorials.

John Mitchell has been elected president of the United Mine Workers of America for the ninth time. He was the only candidate named for the office. The vote recorded for him showed a total of 72,100. The same convention which inaugurated him passed a resolution favoring a child-labor law. Congress and the State legislatures will be asked to place the minimum age for employment of either sex at fourteen years, with a recommendation that the age limit be made sixteen.

The summer conferences of the Young People's Missionary Movement, for 1907, are as follows:

Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, Sixth month 25, Seventh month 3.

Southern Conference, Sixth month 28, Seventh month 7.

Whitby, Ontario, Seventh month 4-12.

Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., Special Conference for Sunday-school workers, Seventh month 12-18.

Silver Bay, Young People's Conference, Seventh month 19-28.

It should be observed that the location of the Southern Conference has not been chosen.

For the first time in the history of the United States, a group of Japanese coolie laborers were held up by the emigration officer, recently, upon their attempt to enter this country, after having passed quarantine. There were 306 men, women and children who had spent a few weeks on Honolulu, where American clothing and a smattering of the American language were acquired. Heretofore, emigrants of this kind have been admitted without question, but since investigating the procedure, our emigration officers have decided that a short probation in Honolulu is not a sufficient preparation to entitle Japanese coolies to enter this country.

Governor Swettenham, of Jamaica, objected to having American marines landed at Kingston for the relief of the earthquake sufferers without his invitation, so Admiral Davis, who had rushed to the relief without ceremony, with his ships and supplies, left the stricken city. There was no question about Kingston's need of assistance; her citizens were homeless and hungry, confusion and disorder prevailed, and viewed from the humanitarian standpoint, no country could withhold its aid or delay for ceremony. On the other hand, there seems to be no question but that our sailors were landed on foreign territory without the invitation or consent of the recognized government. Much discussion has been going on in the newspapers concerning the affair. Shall it finally be decided, on strictly legal technicalities, or social and individual well-being? If the former view prevails, Governor Swettenham will be justified; if the latter prevails, Admiral Davis will be winner.

The Interborough Rapid Transit Co., New York, has devised a mutual benefit association for its employees, which will bestow financial aid in case of accident, sickness or death.

The employees are to be divided into three general classes. The first will be composed of men who receive less than $35 a month. Those who receive between $35 and $75 will form the second class. The third class embraces all receiving more than $75. The monthly payments will be 75 cents for the first class, $1.50 for second class, and $3 for third class. The benefits will be for accident, sickness and death. In the case of a motorman or conductor who is injured, he will receive $2 a day for the first fifty-two weeks. A benefit of 50 cents a day will be paid in cases of sickness after the termination of six days, and not longer than fifty-two weeks, to members of the first class. Members of the second class will receive $1 a day, and members of the third class $2. The system includes a death benefit plan. First class members may insure their lives for $250, second class for $250 and third class for $1,000.

A new and interesting movement has been inaugurated by a number of Y. M. C. A. men in California. It started at the recent conference held at Pacific Grove. One quarter of the men in attendance bound themselves together with a declared "purpose to become ministers of Jesus Christ" and to "aggressively promote the consideration of the ministry as a vocation for Christian young men." The movement is called "The Student Recruits for the Christian Ministry." They expect the movement to extend to all parts of the country, and are desirous of getting in touch with those who may desire to co-operate with them. G. C. H. McPheeters, Palo Alto, Cal., has been selected to correspond with interested parties, and send literature when desired. The special features of the California organization are interesting. Their policy is briefly stated as follows:

We stand for

I. A United Church.

We believe that churches divided against each other cannot stand. We declare ourselves against competitive missionary work anywhere. We agree to work for church harmony and unity of spirit.

II. Missionary Aggressiveness.

Believing in the last command of Jesus Christ in the broadest world-wide sense, it is the purpose of this organization to stand for and promote an intelligent study and a wide-awake, active interest in missions.

III. An Up-to-date Ministry.

We seek the preparation to meet and satisfy both the fundamental and the new and special needs of the church in our own generation. "Forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

DOCTORS ADMIT.

THAT THEY CAN DO NOTHING MORE FOR YOUR STOMACH THAN STUART'S

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS ARE DOING NOW.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

According to the expert analysis of Government authorities in the United States and Great Britain, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets contain the exact elements provided by nature for digesting food in the healthy stomach.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets have saved sufferers from stomach disorders millions of dollars by giving them, in one small fifty-cent package, more relief than countless treatments by physicians would bring about at $3.50 per visit.

Perhaps you are afflicted with dyspepsia—or some kindred disease arising from a disordered digestion. It may be headaches, heartburn, palpitation, liver trouble, insomnia, nervous debility. They all have their beginning in a stomach which does not secrete the juices or grind the food which is taken into it.

If so, we urge you to send for a free trial package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. It will cost you nothing and surely will bring us no gain unless you find, after using it, that you are benefited and feel that you need a full-sized package.

There is absolutely no danger in using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. Nothing is contained in them that has not been subjected to the closest scrutiny by the Government officials.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest your food without demanding a careful diet. One grain of these Tablets has power to digest 3,000 grains of ordinary food. You can be sure, therefore, that no matter what your condition, these little tablets taken after each meal will shortly restore your stomach to its normal condition and render it capable of doing its work unassisted.

We withhold the names of hundreds who have written us voluntarily expressing their gratitude to this simple substitute for nature.

Send for trial package to-day. F. A. Stuart Co., 70 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

[FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.]

AFTER THE SNOW.

Through this gray morning breaking calm,

I enter regions yet unknown,—
Cathedral without bell or psalm,
An organ's grand and vibrant tone.

All night the builders of the sky,
Have wrought while men oblivious slept,

And reared an edifice on high,
That all heaven's purity has kept.

Amazed with whiteness through the wood

I pass as in a wondrous dream,
Like him who dimly understood,
The meaning on the Mount of Gloom.

Are these the self-same leafless trees
That shivered in the northern wind,
Now quite forsaken of the breeze,
And robed to suit an angel's mind?

Such dazzling arches never grew,
Within a human builder's thought;
Such magic fretwork never knew
The skill to cunning craftsmen taught.

All in a night the burdened sky
Has loosed its treasure, drifting down,
And what was weight to realms on high,
Has proved a beauty to our own.

What, though the splendor now will fade,

The lavish crystal vanish soon,
A sanctuary here was made,
Our memory keeps the proffered boon.

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class but for all who read the Scriptures.

Prominent people's opinions of the Christian Workers' Bible:

JOHN WANAMAKER: I have received the marvelously beautiful and complete work—"International Christian Workers' Bible." It is an advance of anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable for Christian Workers.

LYMAN ABBOTT: This edition will be valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible on great spiritual themes directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries and theological treatises.

REV. JAMES A. WORDEN, D. D., LL. D., Supt. Sabbath-School Training, Presbyterian Board of Sunday-School Work: In this beautiful "International" Christian Workers' Bible, a specimen of the fine typography, I have a complete copy of the Scriptures accurately and tastefully marked, according to the very best ideas of Bible marking.

Doctor Hurlbut has been especially happy in deciding upon those passages which treat of the theme of salvation, and upon his division of the general theme into classes. I went through the Christian Workers' Bible testing the accuracy of the classification, and I found it complete in every instance.

These beautiful printed red lines and letters are guides to the great temple of the Bible. This volume must prove a treasure to all Sabbath-school teachers, to all Y. M. C. A. members, and also to the members of the Epworth League or Christian Endeavor, and, indeed, to all Bible readers.

Abba Father!

I thank Thee, that my heart can turn
In simple faith to Thee;
A Father now I know Thou art,
Thy guiding hand I see.
When sorrow and when darkness come,
They only point the way
To Thee, Thou Father of us all,
Thou blessed Light of Day!

Oh, teach me, when mine eyes are bent
Within some darkened space,
To ever lift them up to see
The glory of Thy face;
To feel that love still lives for me
Within the Father heart—
To know, as I have not yet known,
The Father that Thou art!

SOME BY-PRODUCTS OF LIFE.

The greatest and most precious things in our lives are not things which we aim at and get by direct pursuit; they are by-products. They come to us while we are seeking something else.

Friendship is one of the noblest of these by-products. Nobody makes it the main business of life to gain friendships. We do not go about with the fell purpose of seeing how many hearts we can conquer, or how long a list we can gather of those who open the window of their souls to us.

Deep, rich, abiding friendships are not made by design, or by calculation, or by conquest. They come as happy surprises while we are pursuing the ordinary aims of life. A boy goes to school. His main aim is an education. He pays his money because he wants to learn, and expand, and gain mental power. He goes to the institution with one supreme thought: to learn what that institution can teach him. But he soon discovers that almost unconsciously something has been happening to him there. Things he never paid for come to him. Friendships have been silently forming. He has begun to share his life with another fellow, and the other fellow has been learning to share on his part. At first, it does not seem very momentous, but it is momentous—few things more so. There is no other path which leads so directly into the very secret of life itself as genuine friendship, ripening into love. Without it nobody can be a real person. As soon as he begins to give himself out to another person he begins to find himself. His own nature grows larger and richer. Something more important than the lore of books comes to him. He learns through friendship, as he learns nowhere else, how to make his life fit in with another life, how to suppress himself, how to give and take, how to be a part and not a solitary whole. In fact, friendship is the best revelation there is of the real nature of religion—the life of sharing; of receiving and giving; of forgetting self in the love of another; of the widening and sweetening of life through the attraction of a Person who loves us and gives Himself to us.

There have been friendships formed this year which will make all earth, and even heaven too, different to us forever. They will grow and ripen with the years; they will unfold our lives and bring fragrance into them. But it has all come without money and without price. It has cost no fee. It has fallen on us as silently as the dew while we have been busily seeking other things. It is one of the rich by-products of life.

Happiness is another by-product. It is not got by direct search. It is an old story that the pleasure-seeker never finds his quest. You see these eager seekers in all parts of the earth. They "post o'er land and ocean without rest," and they go from one defeat to another. The trouble is that you cannot get happiness by directly seeking it. To get it one must forget it, or better, to get it one must live for something else. Our high moments of happiness come when we are absorbed in some definite aim, and are caught up with enthusiasm for some attainment. Stop at such a moment and set your mind on the pleasure, and you always lose it. To borrow a figure, it is like catching a snowflake in your warm hand; as soon as you examine it, it is a waterdrop, and no longer a snowflake. It is like trying to turn on the electric light to see what the dark is like. It is like stopping a top to see what the motion is like. The way to be happy, is to forget oneself in the work, the tasks, the interests of life, and let the pleasure come as by-product. The more absorbing interests you have the more happiness. The source of happiness is not in some far-away Hesperides, not in ocean travel, or on foreign soil. It is in the common, simple everyday things of life. The person who has learned to see the simple beauties of nature; in the fields, in the woods, in the brooks, and in the rocks, can be happy anywhere. The happiest man to-day in the world is a busy worker in some out-of-the-way place, who is realizing his life through his daily toil, and who finds his supreme joy in the work of his hands. The happiest woman among us is not president of some society of dames, or champion bridge-whist player, but a mother, who is forgetting herself in tender, loving care of a half-dozen children, and who is pouring out all she has to make them realize her fine expectations.

Highest of all human achievements is character. It is the very goal and terminus of the long process of creation. But this, again, comes in as a by-product.

No person makes his character by aiming at it. It is made by the way one does his ordinary day's work. As one of our finest singers has put it:

"Forenoon and afternoon and night!—Forenoon
And afternoon and night!—Forenoon, and—what?
The empty song repeats itself: No more?
Yea, that is life: make this forenoon sublime,
This afternoon a psalm, this night a prayer
And time is conquered and thy crown is won."

Tell the truth, even in the minutest things of daily life, and, before you know it, you will have formed the habit of truth telling. You need not worry about your character; men will learn to count on your word as they count on the multiplication table. Do the piece of work now before you, just as well as it is in you to do it, and, all unconsciously, you will find the habit growing to put your best power into everything you do, and some fine day the world will turn to you as an expert to be trusted. The holiest saint in all the world got his saintliness not by aiming at it, or by dreaming of halos and golden crowns, but by practicing love and generosity and sacrifice in a busy life just like yours and mine. When he saw suffering, he set himself to relieve it; when he discovered selfishness in his own nature, he conquered it; when he saw a duty before his eyes, he did it, until, almost without knowing it, his whole nature set toward actions that are heroic and beneficent. Men found they could count on him. Whether we like it or not, we are weaving our destiny now, and out of the commonplace material of these present days and hours we are making a momentous by-product—our own character.

R. M. J.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

The National Government is collecting statistics from all the religious bodies in the United States. The reports are to be based upon figures for 1906. There are fourteen points of inquiry, among which are, the date when meeting was established, number of buildings belonging to meeting, seating capacity of meeting house, value, indebtedness, language in which services are conducted, number and salary of ministers, number of members, and statistics of Bible schools. Instructions and blanks have been sent to all monthly meeting correspondents, whose names are printed in their yearly meeting minutes. Unfortunately, these lists are not complete, and some addresses are incorrect. It would greatly aid the officials, if concerned Friends would see to it that their monthly meeting is properly reported. Herman Newman, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, is the Government agent for (Orthodox) Friends. All communications should be promptly sent to him.

It is very important that these reports be made as promptly and as full as possible, since the time for gathering the statistics is limited, and the Government figures will be based solely upon the reports sent in. There will be no charitable statistician to make "estimates" for delinquent meetings.

[FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.]

THE PASTORAL COMMITTEE.

BY MARY M. HOBBS.

In the original polity of our denomination, so far as I can discover, the Elders were chosen from the most discerning, spiritual-minded, and concerned Friends (which word means active and helpful, as well as thoughtful), for the purpose of looking after the membership and caring for the ministry. Stephen Crisp, in the olden time, was the ideal Elder. The ministers traveled about too much to have care of the flock, and the Elders were to perform the pastoral duties of visiting the members, encouraging all, and, at the same time, exercising a watchful care over the teaching of the ministers. This was the ideal.

There was a gradual decline in practice until, within my memory, the station of Elder, to which persons were "raised," became largely a station of honor, rather than of service. Persons who were well connected, who stood well, who wore plain clothes and went to meeting pretty regularly, were, in due time, "raised," whether they did anything else or not. This may sound harsh; and, while it contains an element of criticism, it is not here used as such; but is stated merely as fact—historical fact—and is a link in the development of certain later day connections.

There were a few "living Elders," but so far as my observation goes, the functions for which they were intended were largely neglected. If there were no other reason for being thankful for our Uniform Discipline, there was sufficient ground in the clear statement of the duties of the Eldership and Pastoral Committee. Part II, Chapter V, Section 9, states how this committee is composed: "The ministers, elders and overseers of each congregation constitute its Pastoral Committee. The monthly meeting may also appoint other members to co-operate with them in this work." Part IV, Chapter I, Section 1, defines the work: "It is the duty of this committee to have a general oversight of the shepherding of the flock, to be watchful of the interests of absent members, to visit families of attenders of meeting, to extend a special care to those attenders who are not members, and invite them to join in membership when they are prepared to do so. They shall extend a watchful care over the associate members, and encourage them to become active members as soon as they are prepared to do so.

"Section 2. The Pastoral Committee shall receive applications for membership, examine each case carefully, and act upon it as provided in Section 1, Chapter I, Part III."

The first clause of this statement, "It is the duty of this committee to have a general oversight of the shepherding of the flock," calls at once into play the specific duties of the eldership, which are defined in Part II, Chapter VIII, Paragraphs 2 and 3: "Ministers and Elders are associated in the spiritual care of the flock, and they should jointly feel the responsibility of the spiritual condition of the membership and the congregation. Elders are to co-operate with, encourage and strengthen the ministers, in both ministerial and pastoral work, facilitate their labors, promote their usefulness, have an oversight of the public ministrations of the Gospel, assist therein as the spiritual needs of the congregation may require, and extend such advice and counsel to ministers as circumstances may demand. Elders should have quick spiritual discernment for the proper performance of their duties; a good understanding of the Scriptures and of the doctrines of the Christian religion, and a knowledge of the position and purposes of our branch of the Church. They are tenderly to encourage those who may take any part in public meetings for worship and who give evidence of true spiritual exercise, and they are to restrain such as do not give such evidence. They are prayerfully to seek to discern the spiritual gifts that any may receive, and to encourage their exercise and development in every proper way. They are to see that opportunities for such service are conveniently afforded. Feeling the weight of the responsibilities rest upon them, Elders will be prayerful in the active performance of their duties, and it is helpful to have them give public endorsement to the ministry, as way may open therefor, when the truth has been satisfactorily presented.

"Elders are tenderly to advise with members of the congregation as to their spiritual condition, and, in the freedom of brotherly love, endeavor to aid in the attainment of a high standard of Christian life."

This is rather a formidable list of requirements for the individual, but they are set forth with no uncertain sound, and are stated in such a manner that there is no chance of misunderstanding them. They are plainly to consider the needs of the people, provide for their instruction and edification; care for the ministry, and discern spiritual gifts, provide ways of developing such as are bestowed, and watch over the spiritual interest of the congregation, both of the older and younger.

While the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight may not include all of the Pastoral Committee, the latter does include all of the former, so that the duties of these two are usually identical. There are regular stated times for holding the meeting, and particular business reports for it to make out, while the committee can be called at any time, and its actions are not minuted until they reach the reports of the meeting. It is wise for the committee to select a chairman and a secretary, so that the business may be attended to expeditiously and orderly.

In Paragraphs 2 and 4, of Section 1, Chapter XIV, Part II, there is this added duty: "The Local Meeting on Ministry and Oversight shall have care of the ministry and the religious work of the congregations.

"Where particular meetings feel the need of the special service of ministers, the initiative in the arrangement therefor shall be taken by the Pastoral Committee of the congregation. They shall submit their proposal to the monthly meeting for its action."

Section 11, Paragraph 4: "The Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight shall have the general care of the pastoral work within its limits. It shall be diligent and judicious in devising measures and means for the promotion of spiritual life and godliness, and it shall give special attention to new congregations, weaker meetings, and those without a ministry."

From all this, it is clear that the Pastoral Committee is, by far, the most important of the working forces of the church. Its power is creative and initiative, but not legislative or executive. The monthly meeting is the central power and must pass upon the suggestions of the committee.

Does any one fear, that with so much power vested in a few, we are in danger of losing our democratic manner of church government? Were the Pastoral Committee a permanent body, with members holding a life-time right within its circle, as did the Elders under the old discipline, there would be ground for this fear; but the yearly revision of the eldership, when the term of one-third of the number legally expires, gives to the monthly meeting more liberty than our old discipline allowed. Again, the committee can settle nothing, and the meeting has ample opportunity to object to its action if it so desires. With these two provisos clearly before us, and the individual rights of each member to a voice in the decisions of the meeting maintained and utilized—(There is the danger. We are so hypocritical that we will sit still in meeting and allow things to be carried, to which we will object as soon as the concluding minute is read, and over which we are not then too timid to censure and upbraid our friends), we need not sacrifice any of our freedom. But even with these restrictions, the committee cannot but be regarded as a most beneficial factor in our meetings. It is composed, if appointed according to the discipline, of the most spiritual and capable persons in the meeting—persons who know the needs of to-day and who also know and reverence the past, and are trying to so study and understand the principles of our profession as to bring their life-giving power to the people untrammelled with ecclesiastical or sectarian swaddling clothes.

One of the great stumbling stones of the past has been that the Elders knew little, if any more, of our history, and had no more comprehension of the philosophy of Quakerism than the rest of the congregation. This one point should be carefully considered in appointing Elders. We should know that they are familiar with the conditions under which our denomination arose, and that they are acquainted with the principles for which we stand. External conformity is no longer a criterion. It never was a safe guide; and to imagine that an adherence to forms of dress and language indicates a knowledge of the great truths which called the denomination into existence, is to take the rind for the orange.

The Pastoral Committee, being a comparatively small and select body, can discuss all questions pertaining to the welfare of the society in a calm and deliberate manner, and thus the consensus of opinion can be more easily arrived at than in the large and less carefully-informed body. It then becomes the duty of the committee to consider the whole range of spiritual matters—the life and conduct of the members, their growth in grace, the conversion of those outside, the associate members, the teaching they are receiving, the Bible teaching in schools and families, their instruction in the doctrines of the Christian religion as professed by us as a church (this actually receives almost no attention and is a very vital matter), to care for and provide for the ministry, to see that the ministerial teaching is suited to the needs and not allow one or two self-deceived enthusiasts to ruin a meeting and cause the people to turn elsewhere for instruction and edification, as has been frequently the case in the past. God can guide eight or ten people who are looking to Him quite as unmistakably as He can a single individual. It is necessary for the Gospel to be preached to the people, for the young and inexperienced to have line upon line and precept upon precept. If no one in the meeting can be discerned to have received this gift, it becomes the duty of the Pastoral Committee to seek elsewhere to find one whom God has sent. This action sounds subversive, of Quaker principles, but let us examine it and see which is subversive, this method, or the old one of allowing the meeting to die for lack of a teaching ministry.

[The following newspaper sketch gives us a unique picture of the Roman Pontiff, very different from that to which we are accustomed. Some of our readers are acquainted with Georgina King-Lewis, a minister of London Yearly Meeting.—Ed.] :

That distinguished Quaker lady, Mrs. King-Lewis, who has done so much to relieve the unhappy Christians of the Turkish Empire, has recently returned from a visit to Rome, undertaken for the purpose of laying before Pope Pius X. the true story of the Congo outrages. A private audience was arranged through a French Roman Catholic lady, who is a friend of Mrs. King-Lewis. The major-domo of the Vatican, Mgr. Besleti, was asked whether it would be necessary for the Quaker lady to kneel to the Pope and kiss his ring. He replied that he was sure the Holy Father would never wish his visitors to go against conscience.

The interview took place on a Sunday morning. The ladies were ushered through a series of State apartments by Mgr. Bisleti, who, after opening the door of the Pope's room, left them alone with him. It was a handsomely furnished apartment, with white silk curtains and crimson-covered chairs. The Pope sat on a high throne-like seat in front of a large writing-table, which was covered with books and papers. He rose as his visitors appeared, and, after giving them his hand, invited them to sit beside him. The story of the Congo natives was interpreted to the Pope by the friend who accompanied Mrs. King-Lewis. He listened with close attention, and with evident interest. Before entering on this subject, the English visitor had presented to the Pope a copy of her book on Turkey, bound in white vellum. The Pope received it graciously, and said he would have it translated into Italian, and would read it without delay.

Mrs. King-Lewis illustrated her Congo story by showing to his Holiness copies of Mr. Morel's pictures of the poor mutilated natives of the Congo Free State. He took these in his hand, and said repeatedly, "Poor things! Poor things!" He then put the photograph away, along with the book on Turkey, as if he meant to examine them again. When the narrative was finished, he said that he was much grieved to hear of these evil deeds, and that he would use his influence to prevent them. "You may be assured I will do all I can." When Mrs. King-Lewis was leaving, the Pope pressed her hand warmly. He was looking anxious and careworn, for it was too evident that the French crisis is causing him serious anxiety. He has a kindly and strong face, but there can be no doubt his great responsibilities have told upon his health. Mrs. King-Lewis doubts whether he is, personally, in any way responsible for the attitude of the Vatican towards the French Government. She believes that he has resigned political administration to officials such as Cardinal Merry del Val.

A week after Mrs. King-Lewis had her audience with the Pope, the bomb exploded at St. Peter's. Mgr. Bisleti came to tell the Pope of the alarming incident. He at once asked, "Is anyone killed or injured?" "No." "Has the building suffered?" "No." "Then let us kneel down and pray to God for the poor misguided man." Many will hope that the visit of this Quaker lady may induce the Pope to put pressure on the Belgian Government to end the outrages which have been so long a disgrace to civilization.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

A MOUNTAIN TOP EXPERIENCE.

BY RAYMOND S. HOLDING.

Mounting the missionary horse, last Thursday, I started to hold my first services at the two out-stations in the mountains, Potrero and Catorce.

Strapped on behind the saddle was a blanket, while my overcoat hung across the horn of the saddle. The afternoon was all that one could wish for. The clearness of the temperature, and the desert appearance reminded me of the American desert. The only sign of a breeze was an occasional column of dust borne by a whirlwind, straight up to great heights, soon to disappear in the afternoon's glaring sunlight. Far off to the left some herdsmen tended their flocks.

Numerous irrigation ditches ran hither and thither, though long since parched and dry as several months have passed since it has rained.

Thus plodding along, the first hour brought me quite to the foothills well above the plain from which I had started. Then the road became very tortuous, and the hills grew more rugged following, most of the time, the rocky bed of a river which reflected the sun's rays with double fury.

By the end of the second hour I was riding in the shadow of the mountains that towered high around me, almost closing me in on every side. Looking back, once more, over the road I had ascended, I could see far over the place from where I started and even on to the other side where mountains rose to meet the clouds. But night was creeping on and bringing a penetrating cold air, so I hastened on over hills and across ravines, and at five o'clock arrived at Potrero.

It was soon time for the preaching services, and the people began to gather in nearly an hour before the time. By seven o'clock about thirty were gathered around the table where the Bible and a number of hymn-books were lying. Then for an hour and a half God graciously blessed us in prayer, song, Scripture lessons and testimony. There were very few present who did not give some form of expression. The vigorous and unceasing persecution of the Roman Catholic priest has brought out some fine types of Christian character.

On the following morning, I started on foot to the mouth of the tunnel, about a mile distant, passed through the tunnel, another mile, on a little tram car, reaching Catorce about noon. To undertake to describe picturesque Catorce would be only to beggar description. Far up among a group of mountain peaks, that rise abruptly on either side to dizzy heights, with zig-zag streets that are literally standing on end, one looks over dizzy precipices into yawning canyons, beholding sights that actually hold one spellbound with awe; listening to narrations of the peculiar history of the score or more of mines that ramify the mountains in every direction. To look away upon mountain peaks and see numerous altars erected to an unknown God is to have one's senses entirely awakened.

As I was sitting in company with one of the converts, listening to the interesting things he had to tell me, I finally ventured to ask what so many shrines meant on the various peaks. After he had told me of the idolatrous practices I took out my Testament and read Paul's "To an unknown God," which was quite an acceptable lesson for my friend.

The shadows of night were again creeping on, and with it a disagreeable cold breeze. God renewed our blessing again at the usual hour. Besides the believers in Catorce, three men came over from Potrero, adding their prayers and testimonies to others. Though they had to leave at four o'clock the following morning, in order to get back to their work, they said they were well repaid for their effort.

On my return trip the next morning, a convert promised to walk over the mountain summit with me and down on the other side, instead of through the tunnel. At seven o'clock we were winding our way around the summit. Once having gained the highest point on the trail we sat down to rest for the rarefied air had its effects as well as the violent exercise of climbing. But the sight that greeted us was well worth while. That distance lends enchantment, was amply verified. So far away were the mountains that rose on either side that they seemed to blend with the clouds.

Then came the descent, the most difficult part of all, and it was with reluctance that I consented to descend to the plain below. One very pleasant memory of the descent still remains with me, that of a meeting with a poor, decrepit, old man, who was struggling along up the mountain, with two canes, but his progress was slow because of his helpless, diseased condition. Before we reached him, he became exhausted, and dropped down on a stone to rest. We, too, being tired, seated ourselves near him and heard what he had to say. His condition was that of the blind, lame, halt and lepers, who called on Christ for help. So, with my Testament, I pointed the way to the Great Physician, by reading John 3, a few verses from Romans, etc., also quoted from Isaiah, "Though your sins be as scarlet." The dear old man laid down his canes, and we all kneeled to pray. Between sobs and tears, he prayed to God, asking pardon and strength. It was difficult for him to realize that there was a real High Priest in Heaven pleading for him, but finally he said he believed. He promised to be at our next meeting to tell us how God had pardoned him and given him new life.

Mexico, what a needy field! Simple, kind-hearted people, held under the cruel rule of the priesthood and denied the very Gospel of salvation, and, too often, because we, the evangelical Church of Christ, are resting peacefully waiting for someone else to march to the front.

My trip home was over the same mountainous road, but it was for me a mountain-top experience all the way, and I still feel the exhilarating effects of the rarefied mountain air, as well as a closer walk with my Master, and a spiritual uplift.

Cedral, S. L. P., Mexico, First month 2, 1907.

I was at Collamore's the other day, and they showed me a wonderful vase, made in the Royal pottery in Russia, given by the Czar to his married daughter, and so coming through successive owners into the hands of an American purchaser. It was beautiful in form, in color, and in exquisite decoration, yet it had been made out of simple well-selected clay. And I said as I looked upon it, "If an artist can make such a work of beauty out of common clay, what cannot God make out of a common mortal, if the mortal will only give God a chance and allow himself to be made?"—Lyman Abbott.

"NOT DIVIDED."

Cynics are prone to sneer when Christian congregations sing "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and come to the lines,

"We are not divided,
All one body we."

They point jeeringly at the number of separate denominations which make up the Church, and ask us to behold the very obvious refutation of our profession. And yet our inconsistency may not be quite so marked as they would have us think. Evidently the Rev. Sabine Baring-Gould was not conscious of any such incongruity when he wrote the hymn, though the denominations were as plentiful in his day as in this. In fact, it seems to us that the unity he celebrates was not simply a uniformity of external organizations. If we note the further language of the verse we shall see in what the oneness consists:

"We are not divided,
All one body we;
One in hope and doctrine,
One in charity."

Here we have, in the last two lines, the unity described and specified. It is the unity of a common hope, a common doctrine, and a common charity or love for each other and the world. And this unity is already here and has been here for many years. The author of the hymn realized it a half-century ago. Certainly the great Christian denominations share together the common hope of the salvation of the race, the ultimate victory of Christ over the world's sin, the glorious inheritance of immortality and heaven. Certainly they hold the great creeds, confessions, doctrines of Christianity in unison; the matters which individualize them are minor considerations of Church polity or some subsidiary aspects and interpretations of specific doctrines. Certainly they are at one in the movements of their hearts in fraternal love for each other and in philanthropic impulse toward humanity, and this emotion is broadening and intensifying and becoming more hearty and sincere with every year. And this is surely a true and genuine unity.

It has always seemed to us an unwarranted assumption, on the part of those who see nothing but evil in denominations, to quote Jesus' prayer—"Holy Father, keep them in Thy name which Thou hast given Me, that they may be one, even as We are * * * that they may all be one, even as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in Us"—as if it evidently and undeniably referred to an external uniformity and unification. Without going into the mode of relationship between Christ and the Father, we simply say here that Christ's language does not seem to us to have that import. Christ's unity with the Father was not a corporeal one. His prayer is substantially and essentially answered by a unity in the spirit—"one in hope and doctrine, one in charity"—such as now exists among the great bodies of Christendom and is constantly spreading and strengthening and manifesting itself in practical confederation and co-operation. More and more they are interesting themselves in each other, rejoicing in each other's success, praying for each other, ceasing jealousies and antagonisms, becoming convinced that the progress of each is the triumph and congratulation of all, and that there is but one Captain of the Lord's hosts, one Emmanuel's banner, one foe, and one final victory.

As the hymn has it:

"Like a mighty army Moves the Church of God."

But an army is composed of infantry, artillery, and cavalry, and is furthermore divided into corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies. And yet, though each component part may have an individuality of its own and its special officer in command, it is nevertheless one "mighty army." And so it is in the Church of God. The various denominations are "giving diligence to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," knowing that "there is one body, and one Spirit * * * one hope * * * one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all." And this "unity of the Spirit" was remarkably manifested in the recent convention of the Ohio Federation of Churches, as it was previously in the great national gathering in New York City of the evangelical Protestant bodies in the interests of federation and unity.

"At the sign of triumph
Satan's host doth flee;
On then, Christian soldiers,
On to victory!
Hell's foundations quiver
At the shout of praise;
Brothers, lift your voices, Loud your anthems raise."

—Western Christian Advocate.

All the great and wise and good among mankind, all the benefactors of the human race, whose names I read in the world's history, and the still greater numbers of those whose good deeds have outlived their names—all those have labored for me. I have entered into their harvest. I walk the green earth which they inhabited. I tread in their footsteps, from which blessings grow. I can undertake the sublime task which they once undertook, the task of making our common brotherhood wiser and happier. I can build forward, where they were forced to leave off; and bring nearer to perfection the great edifice which they left uncompleted. And at length I, too, must leave it and go hence. Oh, this is the sublimest thought of all! I can never finish the noble task; therefore, so sure as this task is my destiny, I can never cease to work, and consequently never cease to be. What men call death cannot break off this task which is never-ending.—Longfellow.

THE SAINT OF SECOND AVENUE.

At No. 492 Second Avenue, in New York city, according to a writer in Pearson's Magazine, there lies a woman of eighty-five years, who, for fifty years, has not once risen from her bed, but who, through all her sickness and infirmity, has been "carrying on a life crusade against sin and misery that has made her name blessed and beloved in miles of crowded tenements about her." This is Bella Cooke, "The Saint of Second Avenue." The writer thus describes the little home in which she rests, and the work in which has been her pleasure for these fifty years:

It was not like the cell of a recluse, but a bright, cozy, little place, with a flowered carpet on the floor, and green walls, traced with cheerful patterns. Here were wax flowers under a glass, there a picture of Raphael's Madonna; books, papers, sentimental odds and ends scattered about, and the window-sills crowded with blooming geraniums.

In spite of the dull rumble of trains and the vision of clothes-lines cluttered with fluttering garments in the shut-in court-yard, there was something ineffably sweet and clean and quieting in the room. Over the white bed were the words, "The Father Knoweth," while the eye was haunted by the phrase, "Kept by the Power of God."

Looking on that meek face, I could not help thinking of Nicholas Mae's thrilling picture in the great Amsterdam gallery—a venerable Dutchwoman with a crust of bread on a battered table, her hands folded, and her eyes raised thankfully to Heaven.

The wonderful, almost unbelievable thing about Bella Cooke is that, in an era given over largely to the love of money and pleasure, a time in which the churches have seen their congregations dwindling and charity become boastful, she has drawn to her bedside thousands of the poor, the sick, the abandoned, and the sin-stained, and has melted the hearts of the rich, so that she has been an almoner, teacher, and comforter to multitudes. Nor have the agonies of her afflicted body ever halted her ministry of love and mercy.

She has paid the rent of widows and orphans, clothed the naked, fed the hungry, sheltered betrayed girls and led them to noble, useful lives, showered joys and other brightnesses upon wretched children, and all through the squalid human congeries of the tenement districts spread messages of Christian hope and Christian neighborliness.

Millionaires and their wives and daughters have come to that quiet room to see how largely and how nobly life can be lived in spite of pain and poverty. Bishops and clergymen have sat there for inspiration. The King's Daughters have gathered about the bed to plan for the relief of the poor. The heads of great benevolent institutions have visited Bella Cooke to catch the impulse of her brave spirit. The Christian Herald has distributed food and clothing through her hands. And sometimes as many as three thousand poor persons have been fed or clothed or sheltered by her in a single year.

Think of such a life and the possibilities it suggests—for Bella Cooke began her missionary work penniless and alone.

This is not a sacred fable of the Middle Ages, but a true story of America to-day. You have but to go to 492 Second Avenue and swing back the shuttered door on the second floor of the rear house to see Bella Cooke. She is always there. She has not stirred from that room since two years before President Roosevelt was born. There is no lock to her door. It opens at the slightest touch.—Literary Digest.

"THE HUNTINGTON HOME."

The yearly meeting of Friends for New England has established at Amesbury, Massachusetts, a boarding home for Friends. The house and grounds were donated by Sarah Alice Huntington, with the provision that she retain a residence there during her life. The house stands on rising ground about midway between the late home of the poet Whittier and the quiet cemetery where his mortal remains now rest. Adjoining is the "Captain's Well," made familiar by Whittier's poem. Electric cars connecting Amesbury and Newburyport pass the door. As New England Friends are widely scattered, this location seems very fortunate. The board of care and relief have in charge the estate, which was formally opened in Fifth month, 1906, under the name of the "Huntington Home." For "Whittier's pilgrims" and those desiring a quiet and retired resting place, this home offers reasonable and comfortable entertainment. Before the house could be adapted to its present use it was necessary to build on a considerable addition. Our dear Friend, Olney T. Meader, so recently removed from our midst, gave much time and attention to this work, advanced funds, and was favored to live to see the home an accomplished fact. The present residents are an aged Friend, his wife and daughter, who rent three or four rooms for a nominal sum and carry on light housekeeping; Sarah Alice Huntington, who reserves a room or two; and three Friends, who are settled permanently. Anna M. Gove, secretary and treasurer of the board, gives her services as matron and general directress—literally giving herself to this good work. While this home is a new undertaking for New England Yearly Meeting, it supplies a long felt want and has already justified its existence. Here, under one roof, may be seen three little homes affording shelter and comfort to the aged and those otherwise unprovided for. Several applicants are awaiting admission, but for lack of funds they cannot be received. Some Friends have contributed liberally, or it would have been impossible to have made even this beginning. Every expense is carefully watched, and it is hoped, with financial aid, the home will soon be self-supporting. Several homes of this kind established in and around Philadelphia and New York have been helped by bequests and permanent funds, so that financial problems have not interfered with their far-reaching usefulness. It is earnestly hoped that the welfare of the "Huntington Home" will lie near the hearts of all New England Friends who appreciate and love the blessings and comforts of home.

LOT'S CHOICE.

Genesis 13: 1-13.

Third-day, Second mo. 12.—Lot's Choice. Gen. 13: 1-13.

First-day, Second mo. 17.—God's great promises. II Pet. 1: 1-11.

Time.—Uncertain, but probably within a few years after Abram's entrance into Canaan; possibly about 2200 or 2300 B. C.

Place.—Near Bethel, about 12 miles north of Jerusalem. After the division, Abram went south, about 30 miles, to Hebron, and Lot went near the Dead Sea.

Persons.—Abram and Lot, his nephew, son of Haran.

The paragraphs intervening between the present lesson and the last should be read. The whole narrative (Gen. 12: 9-13: 13), is exceedingly picturesque. The narrator, in describing Abram's sojourn in Egypt, does not hesitate to represent Abram as yielding to fear and prevaricating in relation to Sarah. The Egyptian king, in this respect, is superior to Abram. It is one of the characteristics of Scripture to be straightforward, even though a national hero may suffer. Witness this incident concerning Abram, and also the account of David. In contrast with the Egyptian episode, we have the incident of the present lesson, which is so honorable to Abram—a beautiful picture of true unselfishness. That his conduct was rewarded, does not alter the case, for he had no knowledge of what was to come.

Lot—"that righteous man," as he is called in 2 Peter (2: 8)—was not a bad man, but he was, evidently, on a very much lower moral level than Abram. He is a type of a not uncommon class of men, who would rather be good than not, and are better than most, but are not able to resist the attractions of worldliness, and try to live as near the bounds as they can, and, consequently, sometimes actually get over the line.

1. "Lot with him." The account in Chapter 12 does not mention that Lot accompanied Abram into Egypt. He is mentioned now on account of what follows. "The South." R. V. This is simply printed in R. V. with a capital, for it is not the direction which is meant, but a part of Palestine, just as we speak of the South, meaning the southern States.

2. "Abram was very rich." He had become a wealthy sheik, similar to many an Arab sheik of to-day. See Gen. 14: 14; 24: 35. Compare Job's riches, Job 1: 3; 42: 12.

3. "His journeys." Stages or, perhaps, daily stages. "The South," sometimes called Negeb, meaning "dry land." "At the beginning." See Gen. 13: 8.

4. "Called on the name of the Lord." This implies more than a usual prayer—it was an earnest invocation. Possibly, it was to impress on his family and servants the need of pure worship.

5. Lot had prospered with the prosperity of Abram. Association with able and good men almost always brings blessing. Lot's prosperity also implies the kind of treatment he had already received from Abram.

6. "The land was not able to bear them." There was not pasturage enough, and, also, probably, not enough water. This is one reason for separation. Compare Gen. 36: 7.

7. "A strife." There seems to be little connection between this verse and the preceding one, though the strife may have arisen regarding water. Compare Gen. 21: 25; 26: 20. "The Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land." This statement seems to imply that Abram thought, to say the least, it was very poor policy for his men and Lot's to quarrel when there were common enemies in the land who would rejoice at the differences.

8. Abram, as the richer and older, would be, naturally and rightly, the first to make a proposition for a settlement of the difficulties. "Between me and thee." It was evident that Lot was beginning to side with his herdsmen. "Brethren." That is of the same family—near relatives.

9. Though Abram was the older and more powerful, he generously offered Lot, the younger man, the first choice. Nowhere in literature is there a more beautiful example of unselfishness.

10. "Lot lifted up his eyes." From the hill on which Bethel stands there is an extensive view. "To the east the jagged range of the hills above Jericho; in the distance the dark wall of Moab; between them lies the wide valley of the Jordan, its course marked by the tract of forest—down to this valley—a ravine rich with vine, olive and fig. In the south and west, the black hills of Judea—in the far distance the southern range on whose slope is Hebron. Northward, the hills, which divide Judea from the rich plains of Samaria." "No crust of salt, no volcanic convulsions had as yet blasted its verdure, or touched the secure civilization of the early Phoenician settlements, which had struck root within its deep abyss." "The Plain of Jordan." This was the specific name of the lower and broader part of the Jordan valley, which, beginning about 25 miles north of the Dead Sea, extended below the sea itself. Parts of this section of the valley are still extremely fertile, and doubtless much larger portions before the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. "Like the garden of the Lord." Referring to the garden of Eden, which was always taken, as it still is, as a type of ideal fertility and exuberant vegetation. "Like the land of Egypt." Egypt, also watered by a river, was in strong contrast to Palestine, particularly the southern portion, which is often subject to great droughts, and at all times water is relatively scarce, as compared with Egypt. "As thou goest to Zoar," Zoar was a city near the southwest corner of the Dead Sea. The reference does not seem appropriate, for Zoar was far from Egypt, and so it has been suggested that, perhaps Zoan (or Tanis), may be meant. This city was situated in the northeast of the Delta, and would fulfil all requirements.

11. "So Lot chose him all the Plain of Jordan." R. V. He could not resist the temptation to take what seemed to him the most desirable. It was not only fertile, but on or near the great line of travel from the East to the West.

12. "Moved his tent as far as Sodom." R. V. He went in the very teeth of temptation.

13. "Sinners against the Lord exceedingly." R. V. This "verse is intended, partly, to show Lot's indifference, partly, to prepare for Chapter 19, and partly, also, to illustrate the providence which preserved Abram from association with such men."

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "The enlargement of a man's possessions is very often the contracting of his heart."

2. "The greatest blessings often come from unselfish sacrifices."

3. "Lead us not into temptation."

Christian Endeavor.

TOPIC FOR SECOND MONTH SEVENTEENTH.

AN EASY LIFE VERSUS A HARD ONE.

II Tim. 2: 1-13.

Second-day, Second mo. 11.—Wanting ease. Luke 18: 18-27.

Third-day, Second mo. 12.—Turning back. John 6: 66-71.

Fourth-day, Second mo. 13.—Wanting hard things. Josh. 14: 6-15.

Fifth-day, Second mo. 14.—Glorying in tribulations. Rom. 5: 1-8.

Sixth-day, Second mo. 15.—Christ's hard things. Heb. 12: 1-4.

Seventh-day, Second mo. 16.—The endurer's promise. Mark 13: 9-13.

A difficulty that confronts us at once, is the definition of hard and easy things. To a man with the spirit of Christ, the hardest conceivable thing would be to sit down in physical quiet and mental inactivity, and let the work of the Master go undone. Paul's joy in tribulations is, in some sense, a contradiction of terms; for tribulations not related to the work of Christ would have had no accompaniment of joy to him; while that which he saw in the outworking of the tribulations, which he was called upon to endure, made him reckon them as but light afflictions, to be far outweighed by that which should come after.

Caleb's request for Kiriath-Arba could have had no commendation if it was to be conquered merely as a feat of strength or a test of endurance; but since Israel's enemies were there, it was Caleb's glory to go against it in the might that God would supply, and, in his faith, he honored his Leader and reaped his own highest joy, as well as giving us an example of that obedience that pleases God.

Sometimes, we wish for giants to fight or scourgings to undergo, just to show that we are as brave and consecrated as the heroes and martyrs of other days, while the tests that actually come to us find us wanting. We witness for Christ—in the prayermeeting—but how about the schoolroom or the social circle, or the business world? Are Paul and Caleb our pattern there, or do our hearts fail us, and we become as grasshoppers?

The hard things to most of us are the recurring incidents of a life in which the temptation is to be off guard. To be sure, crises come, but often not so that we can recognize them; and if we do, our strength or weakness in them is the outcome of our previous lives, rather than the sudden resolution of the moment. David's "mighty men" (2 Sam. 23), are given their places in the history because of some specified act of valor; but we can not think of them as having been on the field of opportunity for such honors, if their records have not shown them "brave men and true" in the less conspicuous events of their service.

Some people have an unfortunate way of assuming that there is virtue in doing disagreeable things, or doing things in the hardest way—somewhat in the spirit of the self-scourgings and mutilations of other days. God, who made us, will fit our burdens to us far better than we can by taking up what He does not give. Not to find the hard nor the easy way, but to find and walk in His way, is the only thing that should concern us. And when we know it is His, if we, too, are His, it is the one way of joy and peace.

A HELPFUL INSTITUTION IN MISSION MANAGEMENT.

C. VICTORIA, TAMAULIPAS, MEXICO,

First month 13, 1907.

Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

All Friends who are actively interested in our foreign missionary work rejoice at the prospects for simpler, more effective and more businesslike organization, which seem to be opening up before us. And, now that this subject is claiming our attention as never before, there is an important distinction, which we will all do well to consider. There are some duties, which, naturally, belong to the board or boards at home, and there are other duties, which, naturally, belong to the missionaries on the foreign field. Doubtless, missionaries, in their zeal, have sometimes lost sight of this distinction and have attempted to take to themselves the prerogatives of the board, while, on the other hand, even our boards have sometimes failed to see it clearly, and, as a result, have attempted to settle questions which should, in the nature of the case, be left to the missionaries. In this connection, perhaps, a few words from Prof. Charles R. Henderson, of Chicago University, may be helpful. In speaking of the duties of the managing boards of charitable institutions, he lays down some general principles, which would seem to be applicable to the duties of mission boards, as well. He says, "It is the function of such a board to act as representative of the public in the determination of a general policy, the appointment of a competent and responsible superintendent, the observation of management, the control of accounts and reports, and the judgment and publication of results. The activities are legislative, judicial, financial, and executive, but not administrative. A board should not seek to administer details. Such an attempt would cripple the superintendent, drive away a competent man, and require a salaried board of persons, who give their whole strength to the institution, and who, in any case, must waste time in debate over petty details, which they cannot all know." If this is true of boards, whose work is carried on in the same city or State in which they reside, how much more is it true of those whose work is in a foreign country, among people of a different race and in a strange language. Let the boards lighten their own burdens by turning over to their missionaries the entire responsibility for the administration of the work, which is naturally and legitimately their own, and they will not only find that their confidence has been well placed, but also that they will thus be left with vastly more time and strength with which to carry forward their own legitimate duties in the home land. The same thought is well voiced in the famous words of that grand pioneer of modern missions, William Carey, when he said, "We will go down, but you must hold the ropes." Hold the ropes, dear friends, and give us, your missionaries, a free hand in the seeking and gathering in of precious pearls, as our Lord and Master shall give us strength and wisdom.

GEO. C. LEVERING.

OUR OPPORTUNITY IN CUBA.

In the spring of 1900 a few Friends felt called of God to open a mission in Cuba in the town of Aguacate, naming it "El Faro Cristiano," or "The Christian Lighthouse." Other workers soon joined these and a second station was opened in Jaruco a few months later, which became our headquarters. The following year others joined us, and after learning the language went to other fields of service. In the Fourth month, 1905, monthly meetings were established—one in Jaruco, and one in Madruga, and soon after Jaruco Monthly Meeting opened a mission in San Antonio. In addition to these, there are gospel services held in six other towns, these extending over a territory of 40 to 60 square miles; also, services are held in Matanzas and Jaruco jails and hospitals, and street meetings are often held in the city of Havana. In these gospel meetings many souls have found pardon and peace in Jesus.

In the autumn of 1905 North Carolina Yearly Meeting's Board of Foreign Missions took up this work, and since that time the workers have realized that God has set his seal on it in a most definite manner, calling out two young members into the ministry of the Word. These, Venturia Martinez, of seventeen years, clerk of Jaruco Monthly Meeting, and Elisa Garcia, of seventeen years, clerk of Madruga Monthly Meeting, are faithfully preaching the Gospel and attending to the business of the church. These are under the loving counsel of the elders, Celedonio Leal, of Jaruco Monthly Meeting, and Patrona Parra, of Madruga, while the missionaries are at home on furlough. In Fourth month, 1906, our first yearly meeting was held in Jaruco, where we were abundantly blessed with the presence of the Lord and the membership thereof greatly strengthened in spirit. Early in Third month of this year, the missionaries hope to return to the field, purchase a small piece of land and build a cottage home, which will cost the home churches not less than $1,500. During the six years this mission has expended more than $3,000 on rents alone, and the missionaries have become greatly burdened over this loss of money in this way, where, if money could be raised for the cottage home and meeting houses, our future prospects would brighten.

The money we have is not ours, it is the property of our Lord, and we are only stewards—our duty is to use it for Him under His direction.

In the love and service of Christ,

ARTHUR E. L. and A. ELLEN WOODY PAIN.

FROM A MISSIONARY'S EXPERIENCE IN CUBA.

The cock-fight, if not a brother to the bull-fight, is not farther removed than first cousin. It is deeply rooted in the spirit of gambling, which is one of Cuba's greatest vices. From the small boy at his marbles, to the politician with his tricks, all play for keeps.

The cock-fight is outlawed in Cuba, but it is an open secret that away from the eyes of the police and rural guards (whom, it is said, turn their heads that they may not see), this national vice is almost universally practiced.

Recently one of these fights was arranged to take place on a Sabbath Day, near a town where one of our mission stations is located. A place was selected some four miles in the country, and quite an interest created in the event by the sports of the town.

This occasion became a temptation to one of the leading members of the meeting, the outcome of which will be of interest, as it shows the conditions we have to meet, as also the aptness of some to learn the lessons of experience our Father would teach us in His ways of escape from temptation.

This member is a poor man, living in a little home on the outskirts of town, making his living for himself and two boys from the sale of milk from his six cows that pasture on the open range of hills around the city.

His supply of milk getting short, he desired to find some other way of adding to his income. Someone induced him to invest in a sausage mill and try the manufacture and sale of sausage. The enterprise was not proving very successful. Saturday night before the cock-fight he called to tell of his failure, and to tell of some other of his plans, one of which was to exchange one of his cows for a horse that he might go into the country to buy produce and sell on the streets, which is a common custom of the vegetable and produce venders, and is quite a profitable business for a good buyer and seller. But, to our surprise, this exchange was planned to be made on Sabbath, and was part of another plan to go to the cock-fight and set up a stand for the sale of his sausage on that day. We at once set about to show him that he should not go to this place. First, because it was a bad place for a Christian to be, and second, that it was a violation of the Sabbath Day. He replied he was not going to see or participate in the affair, but simply to sell his meat which he thought would be in demand, as the men would need something to eat, and the exchange of the cow was only an incident and very convenient to arrange that day. We pleaded with him; showed him that it was illegal to attend such a place, and that he was liable to arrest, should the police come upon them. He would not yield; said there was no other remedy. He had bought his meat and must sell it, or it would be a loss, and, besides, he was in great need, and must make something to help support himself.

We told him that while we wished him success and were ready to help him, we could not expect God to prosper us when we rebelled against His will. As he left our house we felt he did so with a determination to carry out his plans, which he did next day.

We saw nothing of him for some days, he was not at his usual place in the meeting. The pastor visited him, we prayed for him, and with anxious hearts waited the outcome. Finally he came to meeting, but took no part, did not give the warm-hearted handshake as before, was complaining about things in the church, and criticizing the pastor.

Some special meetings were arranged for about this time, but he did not come at first, said he was not well enough to be out nights. He finally came one night, but left the house as soon as meeting closed. He did not come back the next night, but came the next. The meeting was especially blessed, and the message given was very helpful. The next evening he called on us before meeting, we saw something had happened. He said at once, he had two texts of Scripture he wished to read, and taking from his pocket a little note-book read the texts he had written from his Bible. The first was Ezekiel 3: 17-19, which he said was for us. The second was Prov. 29: 1, which he said was for himself.

Then he opened up his heart and told how all had been a failure, he could not sell his sausage, and even the horse he exchanged his cow for had strayed away or been stolen, and after two days search he could get no trace of it. He said he had rejected our counsel and gone against God, but he had learned his lesson and seemed so happy with the results; said he would continue his search for the horse, but if he never found it, was satisfied with the lesson God had taught him. In meeting to-day his earnest prayer testified to his joy.

Has any other Quaker ever been caught in a like trap such as going to a circus to sell watermelons, or selling refreshments at a Sunday excursion or on Sunday of yearly meeting, and, if so, have they come out as well as the Cuban member?

Correspondence.

ANNOTTO BAY, JAMAICA, January 21, 1907.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I think you and the many friends of the Jamaica Friends Mission will be glad to know the facts concerning the great calamity that has come to this island, and especially concerning Friends and their work. First, all of the American Friends here were preserved unharmed, and very little damage done to the Friends' property. Seaside, Happy Grove, Amity Hall, Golden Grove and Haining on the east end were not damaged at all. Orange Bay, Buff Bay and Annotto Bay were preserved unharmed. At Glen Haven the lower story of the house that has a stone wall, was considerably damaged, and the plastering on the walls above was all shaken off, though the walls will stand as they were. It will take considerable to repair them. The Cedar Hurst Chapel was unharmed, but the walls under the school house at that place were damaged to some extent. The concrete walls and pillars everywhere, unless it be at Kingston, stood the shocks without injury, as did the buildings of wood.

Mr. Vasper, one of the ministers at Amity Hall, a white native of Jamaica, was in Kingston at the time of the earthquake, and was badly hurt, one leg broken above the knee. He is still in a critical condition. An Indian from Annotto Bay, one of the important members, was also buried under the falling walls at Kingston, but was not permanently injured. As he says, Daniel's God saved him.

The shock was first felt about 4.35 P. M. the 14th, and lighter shocks have continued at intervals of more or less frequency up to the present date. There would be many interesting things to tell of the earthquake, but it would make this letter too long. Suffice it to say that every stone or brick building in Kingston is down. Two thousand or more are dead in that city alone. A few deaths have been reported from other parts. The number injured has not been reported that I have heard, but it is large in Kingston. The brick and stone churches in the middle part of the island are nearly all ruined, and much damage was done to other buildings and to the mountain roads. It was a strange experience to see the mountains trembling and to feel the earth under us rocking like a ship on the ocean. Mizpah Cottage by the sea seemed to be preserved by Divine Providence, when buildings much larger and no nearer the sea were swept from their foundations by the tidal wave that followed the quake. And yet they were on the same level and not four rods away. Sada Stanley and myself were up in the mountains at the time; but when we came down on Friday everything was safe and just as we had left it.

Sincerely yours,
F. C. STANLEY.

EDITOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I have the enclosed information from William I. Haven, corresponding secretary of the American Bible Society. It is the desire that it may go into the religious press of all denominations, and attention be called to the urgent need of contributions to relieve the distress.

Very truly thy friend,

MAHALAH JAY, Secretary, A. F. B. F. M.

The American Bible Society has just received the following cablegram from John R. Hykes, the agent of the Society for China:

Notify all Boards, Shanghai Missionary Association 274 members, representing 19 bodies, urges appeal famine relief through all churches. Million and quarter starving. Refugees already flocked cities. In district 3,000,000 destitute. Many millions affected. Many deaths already, though five months' suffering only begun. General relief committee representing all interests in this part East unite in placing relief entirely in responsible hands of missionaries. Opportunity century impress China.

HYKES, President.

A special meeting of the representatives of missionary bodies of the United States having work in China was held in New York January 18, 1907, in response to this cablegram, and it was by them unanimously recommended that churches, societies and individuals be urgently requested to contribute liberally and promptly to meet this emergency, which must continue until June. All funds should be sent to the treasurers of the various Foreign Missionary Boards of the churches with which the contributors may be affiliated, or to the treasurer of the American Bible Society, William Foulks, Bible House, Astor Place, New York City.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I consider "The American Friend" one of the best up-to-date religious journals published. It is leading the church in the right direction.

Thy friend,

W. IRVING KELSEY.

C. Victoria Tamaulipas, Mexico, First mo. 25th, 1907.

David Coppock is now located at Rich Square, N. C., doing pastoral work.

Fred. L. Ryon and Isaac P. Hazard are engaged in evangelistic work at Collins, New York.

The lectures given last week under the supervision of the Board of Education of the Five Years' Meeting at Wilmington College were well attended and much appreciated.

Parsonsfield Quarterly Meeting was held at East Parsonsfield, Me., the 11th to 13th ult. Charles H. Jones, Amesbury, Mass., was present, which was felt to be a great blessing, the Lord speaking through him to the wonderful feeding of the flock, for which we praise Him.

At a recent meeting of the Friends interested in Mount Holly Meeting, N. J., volunteers from Moorestown, N. J., were appointed to attend the meeting on First-day morning at Mount Holly regularly till the 12th of Fifth Month.

A series of meetings was held at Chester, Newgarden Quarterly Meeting, Indiana, by Esther Cook. Beginning the 10th and closing the evening of the 27th ult., seventeen days, and 29 meetings in all. There were three conversions and 11 names were given for membership.

The Anti-Saloon League of Pennsylvania is meeting in State Convention in Harrisburg this week. S. Edgar Nicholson, the State Superintendent, is now making a strenuous effort to get a local option law passed by the State Legislature this winter. Letters and petitions will help to bring the representatives to act.

The following men have been elected to represent Earlham College in the annual triangular debate: E. H. Llewellyn, Sheridan; Oliver M. Frazer, Richmond; Gustave Holscher, Richmond; Clyde Allee, Bloomingdale, and Lester and Chester Hayworth. These six men will be divided into two teams, and one will go to Butler College at Irvington on Third month 8th, to debate with that institution, and the other team will remain in Richmond and debate a team from Wabash on the same date.

We wish to call attention to an error in the poem "I would know more about Jesus," which followed the editorials last week. In the second stanza the word "muse" should be "more," making it read:

I would know more of the story
Lovely and precious to me,
More of the story of Jesus,
Suff'ring on Calvary's tree.

At the one hundred and twentieth annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Prison Society, held the 24th ult., Joshua L. Baily was elected president. The Pennsylvania Society is the oldest prison society in the world, and Joshua L. Baily is its oldest living member.

One of the founders of the Society and its first president for half a century was the venerable Bishop William White, who died in 1836, at the age of nearly ninety years, and who was also the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

A series of meetings was held at Carmel, Ind., commencing on the 6th ult., and continuing until the 22d—30 sessions in all. Conducted by Lewis E. Stout and Lewis W. McFarland. Naomi and Etta Jester, members of Thorntown Quarterly Meeting, singing evangelists, rendered valuable service. The interest throughout was excellent. There were 25 renewals and conversions. Four requested to become members. Louis W. McFarland and wife are doing much in awakening the interest among the members. They will continue their work in the meeting.

Blue River Quarterly Meeting was held the 25th to the 27th ult. The visiting ministers present on Seventh-day were Lewis E. Stout, superintendent of evangelistic work; Murray Kenworthy, of Earlham College, and George H. Moore, of Paoli. The gospel messages of Murray Kenworthy, both morning and evening, were full of encouragement and were a spiritual uplift to all. Lewis Stout preached to a large and attentive audience on Sabbath morning, and also in the evening. The services of Ralph S. Coppock, of this place, as pastor and teacher, are greatly appreciated.

On the 5th ult. Annie Edgerton Williams, Lewisville, N. C., began a series of meetings at Friends' Mission, Va. The Fourth day following, Eli Reese joined her in the work. The gospel was presented clearly and definitely, and the Holy Spirit brought conviction to many, almost from the beginning of the meetings. Twenty-three sessions were held, closing the evening of the 16th. Good order prevailed throughout. Sixty-eight made profession, most of whom were children or young people. Fifteen requested membership with Friends, and 20 with other churches. About 120 pupils are enrolled at the seminary, and the work and deportment are quite satisfactory.

Farland Monthly Meeting has sustained a great loss in the death of Fred. P. Shaw. His father, Reuben Shaw, was born in Boston, Mass. He wrote and published the first book published in Randolph County, Ind., entitled "Across the Continent in '49." He also began the collection of the most valuable private cabinet in the State of Indiana, which has been greatly enlarged by Fred P. Shaw. Fred. P. Shaw was as humble and devout in his Christian life, as he was capable and esteemed in the business world, being a noted shipper of poultry, and president of the First National Bank of Farland. He was deeply interested in all the lines of church work, and freely gave himself and his means to every good cause.

She was born in Philadelphia, brought up a member of the Presbyterian Church, came to North Carolina in 1876, and was married to J. Winston Blair in 1881. Joined Friends soon after marriage at Springfield, and remained in membership there till her decease.

Events and Comments.

The ministers of greater New York and others are making an effort to have the theatres closed on First days.

A bill making prohibition apply to towns and cities has just passed both branches of the Kentucky Legislature with large majorities.

Henry A. Richardson, Senator-elect, from Delaware, is to be commended for his recent stand taken at a dinner given to the members of the Legislature celebrating his election. No drinks were served, and some of the members were twitting each other because they found themselves at a dinner without wines. Senator Richardson, observing this, arose and said:

A BRAINY CHILD.

WISE MOTHER PROVES THE VALUE OF GRAPE-NUTS IN REARING CHILDREN.

There is no surer test of real knowledge than the personal test; observation with our own eyes and other senses.

"Having been raised to believe that one could not exist without meat, hot biscuit and coffee for breakfast, I was skeptical at first about the value of Grape-Nuts.

"But our little girl as well as myself had indigestion all the time and I could not understand why.

"About five years ago, attracted by the advertisements concerning Grape-Nuts,
I decided to try some to see whether it would afford nourishment like meat, etc.
I was worried about our little girl.

"In a short time after changing from heavy food at breakfast and supper to Grape-Nuts, she had no more headache, put on flesh and now, after five years of this way of living, at the age of ten she is 4 feet high, weighs 81 pounds, is in the fifth grade and in every way is a fine brainy child.

"Our boy, 5 years old, has been raised on Grape-Nuts, eats it for two meals each day, is very large for his age and fine looking." Name given by Postum

"Gentlemen, I notice that it occasions some surprise that we have no wet goods before us to-night. I desire to say that in deference to the wishes of my wife and a desire not to offer the slightest offense to some of the members of the Legislature who have honored me with their presence, we have determined to get along without this class of liquid refreshments."

Bryn Mawr College is now rejoicing over the completion of the new library building. This building is a gift of friends, graduates and students. It was begun Fourth month, 1903. It is a building of gray stone in the Jacobean Gothic style of the period of 1630. The east front is 170 feet long, and contains a three-story stack, with accommodation for 80,000 volumes, and above this a large reading room, with desks for 136 readers, screened to a height of 2 feet, as in the British Museum reading room, to secure privacy to each reader.

President Roosevelt is reported to have said in an interview with a Friend last week, "I admire the Quakers because they are such good fighters; they do not fight unless they have to,
but if they do fight they go in to win."
We have some difficulty in determining just what the President meant; evidently he intended to say that a person does not need to be a soldier in order to have the courage and energy to carry out his convictions. This is what we have tried to get the world to realize for some time. The real metal of life is developed and used in many ways other than military.

Philadelphia is to have a new skyscraper, 32 full stories high. The building will cost $3,500,000. It is to be erected on the corner of Chestnut and Fifteenth Streets, where the Association Hall now stands. Already 10 floors have been set aside for persons and concerns who want to be among the tenants. The Stock Exchange will occupy the building. One of the important features is to be a news exchange to occupy quarters in the central lobby of the street floor. It is planned to make this the most complete institution in the world for transmitting news of markets and communicating with other points.

NOTICES.

Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's committee has appointed a meeting for worship, to be held in the meetinghouse on Twelfth Street below Market, on Sixth-day evening, Second month 8th, at 7.30 o'clock, to which Friends and others interested are cordially invited.

James Orr, professor of theology and apologetics in the Free Church College, Glasgow, Scotland, will deliver a series of ten lectures in New York, beginning Fourth month 9th, 1907, on the Doctrine of the Virgin Birth. The lecturer comes under the auspices of the Bible Teachers' Training School, Wilbert W. White, president, and the lectures will be given in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church.

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

FEW PEOPLE KNOW HOW USEFUL IT IS IN PRESERVING HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but, on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink running from Genesis to Revelation binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under a mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere Bible reader are brought to light and tied together. In the "International"

Christian Workers' Bible

the Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority on Bible themes, has arranged on this plan

Three Thousand Selected Texts

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class but for all who read the Scriptures.

Prominent people's opinions of the Christian Workers' Bible:JOHN WANAMAKER: I have received the marvelously beautiful and complete work—"International Christian Workers' Bible." It is an advance of anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable for Christian Workers.LYMAN ABBOTT: This edition will be valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible on great spiritual themes directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries and theological treatises.REV. JAMES A. WORDEN, D.D., LL.D., Supt. Sabbath-School Training, Presbyterian Board of Sunday-School Work: In this beautiful "International" Christian Workers' Bible, a specimen of the finest typography, I have a complete copy of the Scriptures accurately and tastefully marked, according to the very best ideas of Bible marking.

Doctor Hurlbut has been especially happy in deciding upon those passages which treat of the theme of salvation, and upon his division of this general theme into classes. I went through the Christian Workers' Bible testing the accuracy of the classification, and I found it complete in every instance.

These beautiful printed red lines and letters are guides to the great temple of the Bible. This volume must prove a treasure to all Sabbath-school teachers, to all Y. M. C. A. members, and also to the members of the Epworth League or Christian Endeavor, and, indeed, to all Bible readers.

C. B. BLACKALL, Editor of Periodicals, American Baptist Pub'n Society: It seems to me this Bible is indispensable. It seems to be lacking in nothing either mechanical or otherwise as a practical aid.

The Christian Workers' Bible is bound in fine Morocco, Divinity Circuit, with overlapping edges; round corners, gold edges with red underneath. Size of page, 8 1/2 x 5 1/4 inches, beautifully printed in large, clear type on extra fine paper.

EDITORIAL LETTER.

IN KANSAS.

It is now a long cry back to "bleeding Kansas." The only relic I have seen of the days of "border warfare" is the ruins of old Fort Scott, near the Missouri line, where the early settlers used to protect themselves from "the border ruffians." This eastern section of the State, which, even yet, is haunted with memories of "Old Ossawatimie Brown," and where the issues of "free soil" were once so fierce, is now a busy world, crowded with peaceful industry. There are enormous stretches of land here underlaid with coal, oil and gas. There are in this section, too, vast quarries of limestone, great zinc mines, and plenty of Portland cement and brick clay to supply half a dozen States. The surface soil in most parts is rich for agriculture, and many of the owners have a double income—one from the harvest of the field, and one from mineral, or fuel, products farther down in the earth.

There are, however, almost no trees, and one gets very tired of the monotonous level. It is a slight relief to see here and there a stone wall, which some early New England settler must have built to make him feel at home! The towns and cities through which we passed were dreadfully uninteresting. Their builders seem to have had no eye for beauty, and they appear to be content to have constructed abiding places where they can stay while they engage in their pursuit of this world's goods. Perhaps the beauty and sympathy will come later, with a generation that has more leisure for the cultivation of vision and ideals.

Wichita, which was my terminus, is already an attractive city of about 40,000 people. It is laid out on a royal scale. A river divides it into two "sides;" it has a beautiful park and delightful suburban sections. It is such an important railroad center that it is a kind of Kansas "hub." In the famous "boom" days there was an attempt to make it also an educational center. At least four universities were constructed here, either in fact or in imagination. Among them was John Bright University, which never got beyond imagination. But by the shiftings of history, Friends have quite realized their dream. Through the gift of one of the members of Kansas Yearly Meeting, Friends, about eight years ago, came into possession of an enormous university building, which one of the ambitious denominations of the country had erected while the boom was on, and which was left only partly finished when the wave of prosperity ebbed. In this building, still far from finished inside, a very interesting and efficient college has developed. It has been hampered for lack of funds, and it is still badly equipped, but it has done and is doing a work altogether out of proportion to its financial resources. It has gathered a group of well-trained and efficient instructors, who are working in a spirit of loyalty and devotion which is rare, even in older institutions where the salaries are three times as large. The students are mainly from Kansas and Oklahoma, and they are a fine, promising lot of young men and women. Nobody can mingle with them without feeling that this institution is doing a profoundly important work, with very good raw material to work upon.

The "lectures on Quakerism" here, formed part of the program of a Biblical institute, or conference, for the workers of Kansas Yearly Meeting. A number of Friends came in from the outlying meetings, some even from Oklahoma and western Kansas. It was a large audience, particularly in the forenoon, when the entire body of students was present. Alfred T. Ware, Prof. J. Edwin Jay and Oscar Moon were the other lecturers besides myself. Many of the Friends who came from a distance came to the conference with a great "concern" over the dangers of science and modern scholarship. The effect of the campaign, which has recently been pushed with vigor against higher education among Friends, was plainly evident, and every question asked was inspired by the belief that scholarship is endangering religion. I do not believe there was a single person there who carried this view home with him. I never saw such a change of spirit as came over this conference during the three days we were together. Difficulties and differences disappeared like dew before the sun. It was perfectly evident that the real trouble is misunderstanding. If we could have such conferences in all sections where the scare has spread, the dangers would disappear. One of the most moving scenes of the conference was the volunteering of 40 or 50 of the younger Friends to devote their lives to the spread and the deepening of Quakerism. It came at the end of my lecture on the "Message of Quakerism to the Modern World." I had described the Christianity the world needs to-day, and had said that such a religion could be propagated if the young Friends who were now being trained would volunteer to devote their lives to the call.

One after another, they rose up all over the house and came to the front of the platform and solemnly signified that they would help produce what has been described. It was all the more effective and inspiring that it was so unexpected. And those who looked into the faces of these young Friends, who are to be the makers of the next period of Kansas Quakerism, took a new lease of hope.

A SELFISH DREAM.

We remember listening with interest to an elderly Friend drawing a word-picture of an ideal Quaker community somewhere in a lovely mountain valley, shut in from the outside world. Every one in this modern Eden was to be quiet, unassuming, agreeable and kind—just the sort of person any one could love without trying. Every household was to be happy, not pinched with poverty, nor spoiled with wealth, and within these hallowed groups virtue would flourish. All the children would grow into pure and noble men and women, for nothing unsafe or unsound would be present. Meetings would be well attended, because every one would be interested in spiritual things. This, in brief, was the ideal which our friend told us was quite possible to realize. There may be many others who have had similar dreams, and who have felt no little surprise to find people stumbling along in this sordid world while such possibilities lay within easy reach.

But there is a fundamental fallacy underlying the whole picture. Such a community, even were it possible, is not desirable in such a world as ours. With sin and suffering all about us, such a life would be little more than a selfish existence in a religious garb. There was a time when we looked for saints in a cloister, but the saints of to-day are living with other men and women. We are learning that sainthood is something more than purity, more than worship. It is service—labor in behalf of the Good, and against the Evil. It involves endeavor and struggle, a working out of the Kingdom in society.

An occasional religious service is not sufficient. If we point a brother to Christ, we must be willing to walk with him on the way. Men constantly crave fellowship, and a religion which does not foster a spirit as catholic as the desire is deficient. We greet our undesirable neighbors and the strangers, who sojourn among us, with cheering words and warm hand-shakes once a week, and then wonder why the Church is losing its hold upon the people. How little this contributes to a society in which our friends may live, and yet the creation of a society which fosters a full-orbed life is an important work of the Church.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

At the meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of America, last year, a committee was appointed to confer with the Temperance Committees of other denominations for the purpose of considering ways and means of promoting temperance reform. This committee, in conjunction with the Permanent Committee on Temperance in the United Presbyterian Church, sent invitations to the Temperance Committees of the Churches belonging to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to meet in conference in Pittsburgh, Pa., the 30th and 31st ult. These invitations were sent out First month 8th, and members from 14 denominations responded to the number of about 75. After considerable discussion, the conference adopted a plan of interdenominational temperance work, which will be submitted to "the various ecclesiastical bodies for their approval." Elsewhere we publish the proposed plan.

We would like to see the thought and sentiment of Christian people sufficiently harmonized to result in united opposition to the liquor traffic, but such is not the case at present. Our cherished hope for a conference of all "the various Christian bodies in the United States" has not been realized. The proposed plan does not include a number of ecclesiastical bodies, which are doing much for the temperance cause, and its introduction at the present time will doubtless be an occasion for opening the discussion of the advisability of doing temperance work through a "League," made up of representative men from the several denominations, who stand ready at all times to aid and act for any church or temperance organization; or whether our meetings should appoint committees, which would unite with similar committees from other religious bodies in a federated "council."

BY MARY M. HOBBS.

Our principles require that a person shall be called of God, and so would the action of such a meeting. People are often called of God through human lips, and, as a church, we have backslidden in this respect. We have waited for the Holy Spirit to work upon the individual soul as if that were the only means used by God. The calling of the disciples is a striking lesson on this point. We are to discern and call. If God's spirit in the person does not assent, we cannot force matters; but nine times out of ten the Pastoral Committee of a meeting will not be mistaken. Many of our meetings have dwindled and died, many suffer stagnation and decline, because there are no ministers. While we would not say that vocal ministry is in all cases absolutely necessary, we do say most emphatically that it is necessary in the great majority of cases. Our former method has been to so hedge about the call to the ministry, to talk about "touching the ark unbidden" and magnify the responsibility of the minister's life, etc., that the wonder is that any sane person could ever persuade himself or herself of a call to preach. The church has failed and is failing to do its part toward the call of God to "Go and preach my Gospel." We need to stand with bared head and with shoes off our feet, but we need to stand, and having done all to stand. This does not mean that there is to be a cessation of work on our part. Reverence and love beget service, if they are worth anything; and if we reverence the truth and love our church, we will not wait for the thunders of Sinai before we are seeking those upon whom God has set His seal as messengers.

After the monthly meeting has consented to this, it becomes its duty to see that the Gospel does not suffer for want of funds. We do not pay for preaching, but we must pay in order that certain ones may preach, since we are still liable to hunger and cold and disease; and ministers are human and their families mortal, and their needs are the same as our own needs. The call to the ministry does not render the person or the family immune from human necessity. This seems to me a self-evident proposition. God calls His church to preach the Gospel. So He puts it into the heart of a single individual to be a mouthpiece for Him, it is none the less the duty of the church to so promote the well-being of that one that he may be free. This, then, is one of the first and most important duties of the Pastoral Committee.

Its duty is not done, however, when a minister is found. If we are true to our past and our present, we must see to it that our Quaker preachers do not degenerate into priests, or our meetings for worship into a settled program affair. The committee must keep hold of the minister as well as of the people, and any tendency to monopolize authority or assume a clerical attitude should be dealt with at once. It is the sloth and indifference of the eldership, often, which forces, as it were, the minister to take the lead in everything and order the whole matter exactly as the ministers of other denominations.

The ministers do not find the willingness and the intelligence which the station of elder demands; they do not find the co-operation and the encouragement or the word of advice and warning which they need; and so things drift on until, instead of a Friend's meeting, we have a Quaker church. The ministers may be in fault, but they are not to blame in the first place. If we are to be Friends and maintain our position, we cannot shirk responsibility. It will do no good to sit off and criticise and reiterate, "I am a Friend." If we are Friends, our shoulders have to go against the wheels, and our hands and hearts and heads do their allotted part of the work. The work of the Pastoral Committee is clearly defined by our discipline. Now the thing to do is to fall to and study it—study the history of our own branch of the church; get at the heart of the matter and do what it is our business to do, or get out and leave room for those who will. The eldership is no honor roll. It is the heart of the Quaker meeting, and its work is never done.

We have always professed that the elders were the ones to encourage those who spoke to edification and to restrain those whose messages were not. Is this not saying who may and who may not preach?

There has come about a change in the ministers. Formerly they acted upon the advice, "Do not preach if you can help it." We heard much of the cross, much of the "woe is me if I preach not." It seemed as if every sermon was a fresh and awful burden, which they would gladly escape if they could. Now, our ministers feel that they have a message, and they want to preach. If the way is not open at one place, they want to go elsewhere. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that it becomes the duty of the Pastoral Committee to arrange for each one to have opportunity at suitable times and places. In fact, the discipline mentions this very thing: "They are to see that opportunities for such exercise are conveniently afforded." (Page 34, North Carolina Discipline.) There has been a change of method, but I do not believe there has been a change of principle.

There is, however, one thing that I believe to be a strategic point, which I verily believe to be in danger, and that is our meetings for worship. This is a matter which deserves the careful consideration of our eldership. If we are not to break with our past, these must be conducted on a democratic basis. Worship with us has never been confined to singing or preaching, or vocal prayer; and for us to so load the hour of meeting with these matters as to leave no quiet time for congregational worship of soul by soul before God is, whatever we may claim or explain, to break with our past.

It may be, and I believe, for one, that it often will be, necessary to prepare instruction for the congregations. I mean, in plain words, for some particular person to be ready to give religious instruction; but this should not monopolize the entire time; nor the younger Friends to devote their lives to the spread and the deepening of Quakerism. It came at the end of my lecture on the "Message of Quakerism to the Modern World." There has been a change of method, but I do not believe there has been a change of principle.

There is, however, one thing that I believe to be a strategic point, which I verily believe to be in danger, and that is our meetings for worship. This is a matter which deserves the careful consideration of our eldership. If we are not to break with our past, these must be conducted on a democratic basis. Worship with us has never been confined to singing or preaching, or vocal prayer; and for us to so load the hour of meeting with these matters as to leave no quiet time for congregational worship of soul by soul before God is, whatever we may claim or explain, to break with our past.

It may be, and I believe, for one, that it often will be, necessary to prepare instruction for the congregations. I mean, in plain words, for some particular person to be ready to give religious instruction; but this should not monopolize the entire time; nor should we be so afraid of a few minutes of real silence. Here is the special field, which needs wise eldership to prevent one person from monopolizing the service, and at the same time to prevent the emotional and eccentric and erratic from destroying the solemnity of the meeting.

It is the duty of the Pastoral Committee to see that the Gospel is preached, that the members are visited, that our meetings are held to edification, neither turned into a set program, nor molested by the ill-timed and unwise utterances of those who are not safe guides to the people. No one person should monopolize the vocal service. There should be a season of real waiting before the Lord with opportunity for spontaneous service. But no meeting should be left in such condition, that just any one, who is so minded, may rant, from time to time, and destroy its solemnity and usefulness. I have wondered if something of the following would not be a safe and Quakerly method. Instead of doing as we have done, and waiting until some one has spoken, not to edification, and then trying to quench the flow of talk by eldering, which often, especially in the recent past, has proved ineffectual, we should, by discerning properly, find upon whom God was calling and quietly say, "I feel that thee has a message on thy heart, and, if so, be faithful;" and let it be understood that only such persons are expected to take vocal part in our First-day meetings; that is, persons who have the approval of the Pastoral Committee; while the mid-week meetings should be open to any who feel the "seal of silence melt upon their lips." In most of our meetings the eldership is confronted with just this problem. If the First-day morning meeting is held in the perfectly open and unguarded way in which we once held our meetings, there will almost certainly be an outburst of some kind, which has neither edification nor reason at the back of it. Remonstrance is not effective. Some have decided to fill the hour with vocal service, which does not have instruction and religion as its aim. Others cling to the old way, with the result mentioned, early, in this paper, of the people going elsewhere. I believe, were we to adopt the method, outlined, of seeking ourselves for those to whom the Lord is making known His will, asking them to attend mid-week meetings, and then if way opened, encouraging them in spontaneous expression in our First-day meetings, and, at the same time, restraining those whose utterances are not wise, we might improve upon our present methodless plan.

We could, also, give some instruction on these matters to the inexperienced. Suppose some one felt called to service, and no one discerned the call, invitation should be held out to such to have a perfectly free and frank conversation with some member of the Pastoral Committee. There are difficulties in every path, but the way to overcome them is not to ignore them, but to recognize and study them; and this I consider one of our prime problems—how to hold our meetings for worship on a democratic basis, and, still, to edification. The Pastoral Committee has it to solve.

One thing more, and I will leave this matter. Proper pastoral care in our meetings is also a problem. However it has come about, it is true, that the early method of the elders looking after the members has fallen largely into desuetude. Modern conditions force us into many customs, which were not considered at the rise of our Society. Our days are more crowded, and we are, as it were, tied to the revolving wheel with less leisure. Machinery, electricity, steam, regulate the daily lives of most of us. Persons in business do not have the leisure or the time to visit fellow members, as Friends did formerly. Our monthly, and quarterly meetings are no longer social occasions. We hurry, hurry everywhere, and yet the pastoral care of the membership will be neglected at our peril. Our meetings are suffering for pastoral care. How it is to be met? The elders are not to be set aside, if they will do it; but the Pastoral Committee should study the situation; and, if all cannot do it, some one best fitted should be selected or secured who will attend to this, provided the way shall be opened therefor. It should be made possible by the meetings assuming such care of him and his, or her and her's, as will enable absence from home and the relegation of home duties to others. This is the real pastor, and this office should never be allowed to mean that the person should assume all the functions of priest. He need not even be a minister. Religious service, whether in the ministry the eldership, or wherever it may be, is not only a public benefit, but a great sweetener of individual life. If we believe what we profess, that the spirit is above matter, the soul of more worth than the body, character above riches, and that the treasure laid up in heaven is of enduring value, we should so live and labor, and not by being engrossed in worldly affairs to the exclusion of these, teach others that with our lips we confess Christ, but our hearts are with the world.

SOME NOTES UPON THE SO-CALLED GIFT OF TONGUES.

BY IRVING KING.

It may be of some interest to readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND to see a few extracts from a book on some of the tribes of West Africa, written by Arthur Glyn Leonard, an English Government official, who has spent many years among these natives, and speaks from an extraordinary and sympathetic acquaintance with the negro point of view. The book is entitled "The Lower Niger and Its Tribes," and it has only, within the last few months, appeared from the press of Macmillan & Co., London. These quotations show that the so-called gift of tongues is not peculiar to any people, or to any stage of culture. They help to impress upon the ordinary individual, who is not familiar with the abnormal psychic phenomena, that which the editor of this paper so well said in a recent editorial to the effect that such manifestations, far from being an evidence of divine visitation, are rather strong indications of a mind, either temporarily or permanently, disordered. Most of us, if told by a competent physician that one of our loved ones was afflicted with some deadly disease, such as pneumonia or typhoid, would be quite ready to co-operate with him in all possible ways to stay the ravages of the disease. But far too few of us are equally broadminded with reference to afflictions of the mind. We too often allow our religious pre-suppositions to blind us to the advice of men who have given years of unselfish attention to nervous maladies. The skilled adviser is apt to be referred to scornfully as ungodly and impious for attempting to give a natural explanation for what we have, in our ignorance, been too ready to conclude was an evidence of divine favor or wrath. The quotations are as follows:

"The possession by spirits, although not confined to any particular tribe or tribes in the Delta (i. e. of the Niger), is said to be much more common among the Ijo and Brassmen, and women are afflicted in a considerably greater proportion than men. These possessions, which are invariably made by the Owu or water spirit, may occur at any time, or in any place, and as soon as a woman jumps up and begins to talk a strange language, it is a sure indication (in their minds), that she is possessed. The fact that in many instances the obsessed person, in her normal state, is unable to speak the tongue which, when possessed, she speaks quite fluently, is naturally looked upon as direct evidence that it is the investing spirit that speaks, and not the woman, herself. So, too, when a girl or woman, who, through excessive shyness, is too coy to dance in public, develops, when under the influence of the Owu, an excess of boldness, which enables her to do things which, under ordinary circumstances, she would not dream of doing. This boldness is to these natives merely a confirmation of a pre-existing conviction that it is not the person that is doing these things, but the spirit which has invaded and obsessed her."

We may here interpolate that it is an astounding commentary upon our modern enlightenment, that the masses of our people are so ready to look at such a manifestation as this from exactly the same point of view as does a cannibal tribe of the Niger valley. To continue: "On one occasion it appears that one of these women, who was of a particularly quiet and retiring disposition, and who had become a convert of Christianity, was present in Brass at a service of the Church Missionary Society. Suddenly, right in the middle of the service, she sprang up and began jabbering away as fast as she could in some strange dialect. Finding it impossible to pacify her, an attempt was made to remove her. So strenuous, however, was her objection to this proceeding, that it was not until after a great deal of difficulty, and with the co-operation of no less than six men, that her removal was effected."

the Polynesian, there runs a strong current of neurotic hysteria, often unsuspected by the Europeans, who know them best. The early missionaries were startled at the frequent disturbance of their services by an outburst of frenzy on the part of their most promising converts, who professed to be possessed by the Holy Spirit as at Pentecost. They gabbled in an unknown tongue, while their neighbors patted them soothingly upon the back to bring them back to their senses. It was nothing else than the inspired frenzy of the heathen priests, who shivered and foamed at the mouth and squeaked in shrill falsetto when possessed by their god."

It is worthy to note that there is no case on record of the words so uttered being proved to be, in whole or in part, of a real language, unknown to the speaker. As has been pointed out by the editor, they are mere automatic babblings, which sometimes give the impression of being akin to some foreign tongue, but which are the mere bubbling up inane activity from lower brain centers, which the will ordinarily controls and uses to some purpose, but, when this control is destroyed for the time being, these fundamental motor propensities run riot.

A very interesting parallel to the phenomenon of "speaking with tongues" is to be noted in early infancy. When the little child is seized with the impulse to learn to talk he not only imitates others, but often breaks entirely loose and babbles from the sheer delight of using his vocal organs. This tendency is noted more in some than in others. Professor Chamberlain, of Clark University, in a recent book on child language, gives many pages of such "Chinese," as they called it in the case of their child of about three. Even after she could talk fairly well, she would, apparently, find it a relief to relapse into this meaningless jabbering or "Chinese," which she could run off with great volubility, and for many minutes at a time. Gradually, the habits of ordinary speech are fixed and become just as easy as this jabbering, so that it disappears. If, however, at a later time, the control of the higher mental processes is shattered through strong emotionalism, this primitive activity of the vocal organs is apt to appear again, and otherwise well-informed people, who are not, however, acquainted with the mechanism of themselves, imagine such a person is speaking in a unknown tongue under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

If none of these considerations are convincing to some of us, how can we at least get around the drastic condemnation of "unknown tongues," uttered by Paul. If any of us are disposed to depreciate the value of the well-balanced will, and to feel, rather, that the Holy Spirit works best when it is dethroned, let us remember the other words of the apostle, "Let all things be done decently and in order," words which were probably spoken to quell such insane, emotional outbursts.

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO?

By CHARLES M. SHELDON.

There must be some standard of conduct, not a mechanical rule of life, but a living rule centering about a personality. What can any one find better than the personal life of Jesus?

The question, "What would Jesus do?" is not intended as a rule of conduct which is like a mechanical or mathematical rule of life; but it is intended to help the Christian to a standard of life along the highest possible plane of daily living. Neither does the asking imply that one can always tell for himself or others what Jesus would do under all circumstances with absolute exactness. Neither does it mean, What would He have done two thousand years ago? Neither does it mean, What would He do as a divine being, acting with greater power than we possess? but it means simply, What, under the conditions which face us, would He, in all probability, do if He were in our places, and living our lives with our human limitations?

If we take this standard and try to make it the rule of our conduct, we may have as aids to the answering of the question the following:

1. We know that Jesus would always seek first the kingdom of God. It would be His first enthusiasm, His first delight, in every act of His life to place the spiritual before the physical. We know that He would do this if He were living now in our places.

2. We know that He would always act from the impulse of His great creed, which consists of the two articles, supreme love to God and supreme love to man. His entire life was filled with the result of this creed, and all His actions necessarily were saturated with those great principles.

3. We know that in everything Jesus would do He would not sacrifice principles, even to preserve His physical life. He cheerfully gave up His physical life for the sake of being witness to the truth when He was living on the earth, and we know that He would do the same again. In other words, the spiritual interests of life would always outweigh the physical, and in a case where conduct demanded the elevation of the spiritual, Jesus would always sacrifice the physical to it.

On the basis of these three rules of conduct in Jesus' own life, which I think would always remain the same, we are obliged to work out in detail His probable conduct if He were living now. That is, we know that, when Jesus was here, He sought first the Kingdom, He made the great principles of His life love to God and man, and He exalted the spiritual over the physical.

It is, and always will be, a tremendously interesting query with men to know just how a person like Jesus would act if He were obliged to live the life which we live. Very many people, even those who call themselves Christians, have said of late years that Christianity cannot be lived out in practical detail, that the commands of Jesus were not intended for the business or political or social world, and that any attempt to carry out His teaching in detail would result disastrously.

Some of us, however, do not believe that such a statement is true of Christianity or of the teachings of Christ. They were the most intensely practical teachings the world has ever received, and just so far as they have been actually applied, and only so far, the world has gone forward in power and in real progress.

* * * *

Whether we can answer in detail as to the probable conduct of Jesus under all circumstances (and I think it is a daily problem with the Christian, which will remain with him as long as he lives), this much we do know, that the power of Christ is a practical power among men. He was not a visionary dreamer living apart from men's interests. He was one who took part in the energy of the world. He wishes us to do the same. He prayed for His disciples, that they should not be taken out of the world, but that they might be kept from its evil. If we ask the question, What would Jesus do? with honesty, and then attempt to answer it with sincerity, we shall find our lives growing and developing in practical ways, and we shall also live to ascertain this great truth, that the religion which Jesus brought into the world claims the right to every department of men's lives. "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God," is the distinguishing mark of Christianity. If Jesus had taught us nothing more than that, He would have taught something which is the very basis of all progress and of all power.—C. E. World.

"There is no victory without fighting."

"Within the limits of man's free will, he's the captain of his own destiny."

"The father knew the shortest way home was by way of the far country."

"The sky-scrapers of New York he called 'monuments of architectural ugliness,' but the steel used in construction is all tested; so 'God has tested your frame and knows what you can bear.'"

"Milton's theology has percolated the human mind; his devil is almost equal to God. In the Bible I find no such devil. In Job, the greater poet, I find a devil with a chain upon his heel. He comes and asks God, 'May I tempt Job?'

"The way of escape from temptation, pray, 'Oh God, let thy silence come into my soul,' and your soul will become like flowers put into fresh water."

"Every human heart is a theatre. We are constantly acting. We are preparing dramas. We ourselves are the actors. We play we would do certain things. Follow this for ten minutes and you are ripe for evil. Ring the curtain down, put out the footlights, flee to your knees."

"There is no peculiar temptation come to you. They are such as are common to men."

"Let us all bow into silence before the Lord."

"They should look for a light. Jesus is the light."

"Are you willing to be lost? Surely, no!"

"Are you willing to be found? Then don't run away. Stand still and let the shepherd find you. The sheep did not seek the shepherd. The shepherd sought until he found the sheep."

"There are no accidents in the Lord's Kingdom; all is governed wisely."

Text—"And He went a little farther." Matt. 26.

"The story of Jesus is loved by all classes."

"We find the reflection of our noblest selves in Jesus."

"We see the marvel and the mystery of the complete obedience of Jesus. He has left all to go into loneliness."

"In all our most sacred experiences we must go a little further, and go alone."

"Luther had the splendid fearlessness of perfect honesty."

"Erasmus, the accomplished scholar, said, 'I will follow as far as the times will permit.' He would not take the last step."

"Jesus won through His courage to go on. This is the stamp of true genius."

"You are incomplete, because you haven't the courage to be complete. The rich young ruler failed here."

"At the gate of his Gethsemane he turned away sorrowful."

"The exhaustion was the drain of a broken heart. All the world ended here to the disciples. They slept from sorrow."

"Not my will, but Thine be done."

"The Angels' ministry was a stone's throw farther on. From here He went on serenely. The disciples fled, for they found nothing of this, by sleeping at the gate."

"Gethsemane is not a failure."

"In the Christian life something renounced is always something gained."

"What we want is sanity. What we want is surrender. What we need, having gone so far, is our Gethsemane. Then only a little farther than we have gone before is victory, complete, eternal."

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Second mo. 18.—God's covenant with Abraham. Gen. 15: 1-16.

Third-day, Second mo. 19.—Covenant confirmed. Ex. 6: 2-8.

Fourth-day, Second mo. 20.—Covenant performed. Neh. 9: 6-10.

Sixth-day, Second mo. 22.—A new covenant. Heb. 8: 6-13.

Seventh-day, Second mo. 23.—Covenant renewed. Gen. 17: 1-9.

First-day, Second mo. 24.—An abiding inheritance. I Pet. 1: 1-9.

Time.—Uncertain; possibly about 2200 B. C., and contemporary with Hammurabi.

Place.—Among the oaks of Mamre, in Hebron, twenty or twenty-five miles south of Jerusalem. This was the headquarters of Abraham.

The account between the last lesson and this should be read. It shows "how Abram's faith in God's promise gave him balance and dignity, courage and generosity in dealing with critical circumstances and important personages." His was the victory of faith all through; yet, we can hardly doubt that there were times of discouragement and disappointment. Greatest of these, the fact that he had no heir—no son to succeed him and to found the race that had been promised.

1. "After these things." The incidents described in the preceding chapter. "In a vision." A common method of communication, especially among the prophets. Compare Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, also Gen. 20: 7, where Abraham himself is called "a prophet." "Fear not." Implies Abram's state of mind. "Shield." Figuratively, for a defence. A very common metaphor. Deut. 33: 29; Psa. 3: 3; 18: 2-30, etc. "Thy reward shall be exceeding great." This is a little clearer. Thy reward for obedience shall be exceedingly great.

5. "And he brought him forth abroad." Out of his tent. "The starry sky is at once a striking evidence of the Divine power and an effective example of what is practically innumerable." Psa. 8:3; Isa. 40:26. "Tell the stars." "Tell," old word for count; it is still preserved in "Bankteller." Amer. R. V. reads "number."

6. "And he believed in the Lord." "Against appearances he trusts in God, surrenders himself to Him in full confidence that He will fulfil His promise." "And he counted it [his trust] to him for righteousness." "For Abram there was no 'law'; hence his righteousness was not that which consisted in obeying it (Deut. 6:25; 24:13), but was devotion to, and trust in, God of a more general kind." Compare Rom. 9:3, 4, 9, 22; Gal. 3:6. Note that it was not belief in doctrines, or practices, or a creed, or a law, or a theology, but faith—a personal, filial faith in God. It was not faith in lieu of righteousness—a substitute for righteousness. Faith is the means or instrument which tends to righteousness as its result. "God counts this faith as sure to work out in him a divine righteousness." A man who sows confidently expects corn to bring forth corn, wheat to bring forth wheat.

8. Abram wishes some sign or proof. This request does not show a lack of faith, but was a desire to have some assurance that the message had not been misunderstood.

9-11. The incident described is not a sacrifice, for there does not seem to have been an altar, but a solemn act of covenant. Such contracts were not uncommon in antiquity. "The contracting parties pass between the divided victims, each thereby symbolizing that, in case he breaks the terms agreed to, he is willing to be parted assunder in like manner." This was the idea of such a practice. The "fowls," "birds of prey." R. V. threatening to prevent the completion of the covenant were an omen of evil. Abram, by driving them away, shadowed the failure of all attempts to change the Divine plan. The number three was a sacred number, and so is appropriate here.

12. "When the sun was going down." This would seem to be another vision from that described in verse 5. "A deep sleep." A condition when a vision might be expected. Compare Genesis 2:21; Job 33:14, 15. "A horror of great darkness." A horror which was as a great darkness, a sense of something terrible. "And he said unto Abram." The Lord in this vision. "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be sojourners in a land that is not theirs and shall serve them." Amer. R. V. "Stranger" in A. V. is properly "sojourner." A temporary resident is meant. Compare Gen. 47:4; Deut. 26:5; Isa. 52:4, which all refer to the sojourn of the children of Israel in Egypt. "Four hundred years." A round number. In Acts 7:6, the same period is given; in Ex. 12:40, 41; Gal. 3:17, the period is "four hundred and thirty years." It is likely that absolute accuracy is not intended, but that in each case round numbers are meant, just as we should say, "America was discovered by Columbus four hundred years ago," knowing that it was not strictly accurate.

14. "Will I judge." Doubtless referring to the plagues.

15. Abram, himself, will be free from misfortune and will reach a good old age. "Go to thy fathers." Join them in "Sheol," the grave. Compare Gen. 37:35; 41:30.

16. "In the fourth generation." If the period of sojourn in Egypt was 400 years, then each generation would be 100 years. "Hither." Palestine. "For the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full." The idea seems to be that the possession of Canaan by the Israelites is to be postponed until the Amorites (taken for the whole of the Canaanites), have shown themselves unworthy to possess the land. Compare I Kings 21:26; Lev. 18:24, 25.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness."

2. "Only believe, all things are possible to him that believeth."

TOPIC FOR SECOND MONTH TWENTY-FOURTH, 1907.

FOREIGN MISSIONS: THE KINGDOM IN THE ISLANDS.

Isa. 42: 10-13, 16, 17.

Second-day, Second mo. 18.—The islands are Christ's. Ps. 72: 1-10.

Third-day, Second mo. 19.—All rejoice in Him. Ps. 97: 1-12.

Fourth-day, Second mo. 20.—They shall glorify Him. Isa. 24: 13-15.

Fifth-day, Second mo. 21.—They shall see His mercy. Isa. 41: 1-9.

Seventh-day, Second mo. 23.—Judging the isles. Ezek. 39: 1-7.

More than four score years of life, and nearly fifty of these spent in mission work, is the biography, in brief, of Titus Coan, the great missionary to Hawaii. We might suppose that, for such a career, he had carefully measured his strength and spared himself severe exertion. But when we read of his preaching three times before breakfast, and 43 times in eight days; and of his arduous tour of Hilo by canoe and on foot—a journey of 300 miles—within the first year of his sojourn on the island, after three months spent in acquiring the language, we turn for our key to his life to the Scripture, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength."

Results? On July 1, 1838, four years after his arrival at Honolulu, 1,705 persons united with the church; and in the five years, ending in 1841, more than 7,500 members were brought into its fellowship in Hilo alone, with most satisfactory conditions of steadfastness and real Christian character.

Madagascar was the scene of one of the bloodiest and most persistent efforts of modern times, to blot out the religion of Jesus Christ as it had been planted there under the patronage of King Radama between 1818 and 1828. Radama's successor, Queen Ranavalona I, devoted twenty-five of the thirty-three years of her reign to such efforts to stamp out Christianity that practically all mission work by foreigners was stopped. Besides persecutions in many other ways, several thousands of the native converts were put to death, many of them by torture or starvation. "Yet, the little company of believing men and women, left as sheep without a shepherd in 1836, had multiplied at least twenty fold in 1861." Spectators of executions, seeing the fortitude of the believers, said, "This is the finger of God; there must be something divine in this belief;" and, despite the dangers with which it threatened them, many of them, too, became followers of Christ.

In Tahiti, the most important of the Society Islands, the Tahitian Missionary Society was formed by the king in 1818, about twenty-one years after the arrival of missionaries. In 1839, the captain of a whaling vessel said it was "the most civilized place that I have been at in the South Seas. It is governed by a dignified young lady, about twenty-five years of age. They have a good code of laws, and no liquors are allowed to be landed on the island. It is one of the most gratifying sights the eye can witness on a Sunday, to see in their church, which holds about 5,000, the queen near the pulpit, with all her subjects around her, decently appareled, and in seemingly pure devotion."

But Satan never wearies. Here, as in Madagascar, the introduction of liquor by the white man, and the hostility of the French Catholics, who came to have control, undid much of the good that had gone before. Yet, we know he is not to be the ultimate victor.

Missionary Department.

CHRISTIANSBURG INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE—1906.

The following extracts, culled from the annual report may give some idea of the work carried on at Cambria, Va., under the auspices of the Friends' Freedmen's Association, of Philadelphia:

FROM THE PRINCIPAL'S REPORT.

From one-half acre of land to 185 acres; from one building to 10; from one pig to 41 head of live stock; from $1,800 annually for teachers' salaries and general expenses to $8,100 for the same items; this has been the record of Christiansburg Industrial Institute for the ten years just passed.

When the farm was purchased only the old mansion was on the place, and the soil was very thin. The mansion house has been turned into a school building; a slave cottage and what was once a smoke house have been converted into sleeping quarters for boys, while a dormitory, two cottages, barn, and shop building have been built new.

The improvement in the land can be judged when it is known that our first crop of wheat from one field yielded six bushels to the acre. The second crop from the same field yielded 24 bushels to the acre. The whole farm has made corresponding improvement. Literally, we are making two blades of grass grow where one grew before. In point of productive work the farm is the most profitable of our industries. During last year there was an average of seven students per month, to whom was paid in credits on board account $748.86. The return from this labor is as follows: 442 bushels of wheat, 500 bushels of corn (estimated), 23 tons of rye hay, 4½ tons of timothy hay, 150 bushels of oats, garden vegetables, $115.00; dairy products, $291.57. In addition to the above there were supported on the farm during the year a herd of 21 cows and calves, seven horses, 13 hogs and between 60 and 100 chickens. This is an encouraging report, but the principal is of the opinion that the showing can be made much better.

The printing department effects a saving to the institution of more than $100.00 yearly in printing. Besides doing all job printing required by the school, it also publishes a small paper quarterly, which helps to circulate information about the school. Instruction was given to nine boys during the past year in carpentry. They have erected one cottage and done repairs, amounting to $643.70.

In the laundry all washing for students and teachers has been done. During the year the laundry did work for an average of 46 persons monthly, which, valued at $1.00 per person per month, amounted to $581.00.

In other years attempts have been made to maintain a separate cooking department. The success which we had hoped for has never attended our efforts in this direction, so that this year the plan of combining this department with the boarding department has been adopted. This method has certain disadvantages, but, taking all things into consideration, we believe it is an improvement over the old plan.

Before the death of Charles Marshall he trained a boy to do shoe-mending. This boy is now doing all shoe repairing for the students and teachers, and is also training another boy to assist him at this work.

FROM THE TREASURER'S REPORT.

In addition to the increase in receipts for the current expenses, several large permanent improvements have been provided for. Through the perennial generosity of our friends, Elliston P. Morris and Joshua L. Baily, we were able to buy for $2,500, the 85 acre farm adjacent to our farm, which had been previously owned by our teachers, Charles L. Marshall and Edgar A. Long. Upon this new property there is a far better water supply than the one made use of by the school heretofore, and through the further generosity of the same friends, we are now installing a new water supply system which, it is estimated, will cost $1,200.00.

Improvements have also been going on in the school plant. An excellent teacher's cottage, which would be a credit to its builders anywhere, has been designed and erected by our carpentry department, at a cost for materials of about $800. All the buildings have also been thoroughly repaired and are now in good condition. About $500 have been spent in new furniture, beds, blankets, linens, lamps, etc. The old unsatisfactory desks of the school rooms have been replaced with more modern ones. A reaper and binder, a wagon, two plows and a hay fork have been added to our farm equipment.

The policy of the board not to spend money which it does not have, and if expenses have to be incurred, to raise the funds to provide for them, has been rigidly adhered to. We believe that this course will meet its reward by larger assistance for this school from friends of the negro. We particularly commend this work, which is now on a substantial and permanent basis, to the attention of those persons who are desirous of making charitable bequests. Our endowment fund is only $5,500, and we believe its enlargement by gifts and bequests will bear excellent fruit in helping to solve the great negro question of the South. In making this statement, we can very properly call attention to the fact that this institution differs from most similar schools of the South, in that its finances are entirely handled by a strong board of managers in Philadelphia.

Respectfully submitted,

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD,
Treasurer.

SILENT CRITICISM.

Criticism that says not a word counts for most. Those who most effectively rebuke us and help us to better living are not they who talk freely to us about our shortcomings, but they who are quietly doing the things that we are failing to do. Suppose we adopt that plan of criticising others: whenever we see another failing at any point, let us say not a word about it, but quietly see to it that we succeed, in our work of life, where that one is failing. Nine times out of ten this will help the other more than spoken criticism,—which usually fails utterly; and ten times out of ten we shall be the gainers by it. Let us remember, too, that the faults in others that we most easily notice are usually our own worst faults.

Character is never the same after marriage as before. All are interested in hearing of the establishment of a newly-married pair in what relates to equipment of external life. Far more interesting would it be if we could trace the mental establishing that is going on, as old traits of character are confirmed or cast aside, and new ones developed or implanted.—Mary C. Ware.

The God who could be satisfied with a sinning world would be a sinful God.

Every man has at times in his mind the ideal of what he should be, but is not. This ideal may be high and complete, or it may be quite low and insufficient, yet in all men that really seek to improve, it is better than the actual character. Man never falls so low that he can see nothing higher than himself.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Alfonso Bales, who is doing pastoral work at Twin Mound, Kan., is doing good work. The meeting is about to lose some of its valuable members, who are seeking homes elsewhere.

A two weeks' revival service, conducted by Willis Bond, Mooresville, Ind., has just closed at Georgetown, Ill. The church was greatly blessed and some definite work done.

Fred. L. Ryon, Poplar Ridge, N. Y., held a series of meetings at Collins, N. Y., from the 27th ult. to the 4th inst. There was a good attendance. A spirit of deep earnestness pervaded the meetings, and a great deal of good was done.

J. L. Spicer has aided the Government agent in gathering statistics from New York Yearly Meeting by sending him the names and addresses of all the monthly meeting clerks, together with the number of meetings in each monthly meeting.

David J. Coppock and wife, Addie S. Coppock, from New Garden Quarterly Meeting, Indiana, have gone to North Carolina, with a view of religious service for several months among the members of Rich Square Monthly Meeting.

The Arch Street Philadelphia Quaker Round-table invited the members of the Philadelphia Round-table to meet with them the evening of the 4th inst. Joseph Elkinton read his paper on "Mysticism"—the same which he gave recently before the divinity students of Harvard University.

W. Irving Kelsey, C. Victoria, Mexico, writes that a prominent missionary of another denomination, sent to him some time ago for literature setting forth Friends' views on the ordinances. Among other things, he sent him Rufus Jones' Baptism and Communion. On returning the same, he wrote: "I think you have much in favor of your doctrine, and I hope it will have larger acceptance."

The series of meetings recently held at Big Jim Mission, Mardock, Okla., conducted by R. S. Burnett and G. W. Adams, was crowned with success. Unfavorable weather and bad roads were very disagreeable, yet the chapel was many times crowded to overflowing, many having to stand outside. In a few instances some outside pressed their way through to the front, seeking salvation, and graciously found peace. There were 34 conversions and renewals, and 20 accessions to the meeting.

Vanwert Quarterly Meeting, held at Vanwert, Ohio, the 1st and 2d inst., was a season of refreshing to the church. The visiting ministers present were Ira C. Johnson, Yearly Meeting Superintendent, and A. J. Furstenberger. A number of Friends who are not in the habit of attending were present, and all were greatly blessed. The quarterly meeting adjourned to meet at Rockford, Ohio, the first Seventh day in Fifth month, 1907.

The Philadelphia Round-table, which has been studying the present condition of Friends, taking up a review of each yearly meeting separately, has, after two years, just completed the work. One evening was devoted to a review of the activities among Race Street Friends, presented by members of their own meeting. A few meetings will be devoted to a study of the problems now confronting the Society, especially those of Philadelphia Friends.

The following is taken from the minutes of Marlborough Monthly Meeting, New York:

It has pleased our Heavenly Father to remove from among us our dear friend, Janet D. Birdsall, whose quiet and consistent life best attested to her Christian character. She was a devoted wife and mother, giving every attention to the loved ones in the home circle and making the home a place to be longed for by the absent ones. Delicate health in later years kept her from meeting regularly with us, but as often as she could she attended the morning service. She spoke words of assurance and of her hope of heaven to friends just before she entered into rest.

We have received the following letter from Edith M. Ransome, Cleveland, Ohio:

"In your paper of First month 24th, my name was mentioned as copied from newspaper accounts respecting the outbreak of tongues, so feel the Lord would have me make a statement of where I stand in relation to it. In the first place, those reports were sensational and not altogether true. For myself, I wish to say that while I was seeking Jesus, the enemy came as such an angel of light that when my tongue was touched, I dared not quench it for fear of grieving and quenching the Holy Ghost. He has shown me that it was not of the Lord for me to speak in tongues. Because my heart was open before Him, He has shown me that I need not go back on anything that the Lord has done for me, but am more determined than ever to be all He would have me to be."

W. J. Dawson held meetings in Poughkeepsie the last few days in First month, and our friend, J. L. Spicer, sends us the following account:

"The churches generally united in the effort, and upon First-day there was an exchange of pulpits. Meetings were held in the First Congregational Church at 3.30 P. M. and 7.30 in the evening. Upon First-day evening a great throng filled the Opera House, and there was a large overflow meeting held the same hour in the First Reformed Church. This was in charge of Willard O. Trueblood, Friend's Pastor, assisted by pastors of other churches. The hymns used were mostly the familiar Gospel hymns, which were printed upon sheets. The Lord's Prayer was repeated in unison, and much use was made of silence in the worship. As one expressed it, 'I have heard nothing but real Quaker sermons in all the meetings.' There were several hundred requests for prayer, which were submitted in writing."

We glean the following from a Richmond, Ind., daily:

"There will be a joint meeting of the Intercollegiate Peace Association and the Cincinnati Peace Society on May 17th and 18th. The work of these two great peace-working societies is assuming important proportions. Prof. Elbert Russell, Earlham, who is secretary and treasurer of the Intercollegiate Association, is working hard to make this meeting a great one. Congressman Bartoll, of Missouri, and Congressman Burton, also of Missouri, are expected to be on the program. Secretary Elihu Root, Department of State, cannot speak, owing to business matters that detain him. Andrew Carnegie has given $1,000 to the Association, and it has raised another $1,000 to meet his conditions. This amount is to be used as an incentive for students to write essays and to be used in oratorical contests on peace subjects. On the night of May 17th the oratorical contest will be held, contestants from the various colleges of the Association participating. Prizes for first, second and third places are: $75, $50 and $25, respectively."

A correspondent at Friends' University, Wichita, Kan., writes: "We have just closed our Bible Institute, which was a very successful one. The experiment of a lecture course, as proposed by the Education Board of the Five Years' Meeting, is proving a great success. The lectures given by Dr. Rufus M. Jones are full of most valuable information and timely suggestions. They are an inspiration to higher, better and purer life; and in pointing out the present needs in the activities of the church, he pictures in a most impressive way what the Society of Friends should be and do to fulfill her mission in the world.

"It is a cause of serious regret that so few of our members can have the benefit of them. They are needed by, and would be very helpful to, every community of Friends. None the less would they be valuable to the Christian world at large. We feel that they have given us a real spiritual uplift.

"In addition, Alfred Ware, Richmond, Ind., rendered very acceptable service in his contributions to the program. Professor J. E. Jay and Oscar Moon presented able and instructive papers. The Institute, as a whole, was by far the most successful ever held by the Yearly Meeting Committee. Nathan Brown, Stella, Okla., and chairman of the committee, presided at the meetings."

GUIDES CHILDREN.

EXPERIENCE AND A MOTHER'S LOVE MAKE ADVICE VALUABLE.

An Illinois mother writes about feeding children:

"If mothers would use Grape-Nuts more for their little ones, there would be less need for medicines and fewer doctor bills.

"If those suffering from indigestion and stomach troubles would live on Grape-Nuts, toast and good milk for a short period they would experience more than they otherwise would believe.

"Our children have all learned to know the benefit of Grape-Nuts as an appetizing, strengthening food. It is every evening, with few variations, like this: 'Mama, let's have toast and Grape-Nuts for breakfast; or, let's have eggs and Grape-Nuts'—never forgetting the latter.

"One of our boys in school and fifteen years of age repeatedly tells me his mind is so much brighter and in every way he feels so much better after having Grape-Nuts as a part if not all his breakfast." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

methods of work, and the practical measures most worthy of promotion by the whole Church, so that denominational temperance work shall not be divisive, but combined in moral sweep and impact.

(5) To so inculcate temperance principles as to preserve the rising generation from the ravages of intemperance and to produce a stalwart temperance army in opposition to the liquor traffic.

(6) To create a sentiment which will compel the civil authorities to perform their whole duty concerning the traffic, prevent the necessity for any Christian, directly or indirectly, supporting, encouraging, condoning or acquiescing in this most heinous wickedness, and to impress upon the individual Christian his duty to refrain from giving any encouragement to the traffic.

(7) To enlist the platform and the printing press in behalf of better temperance laws, and in protest against non-enforcement or violation of existing laws.

(8) To preserve the Church from entangling political alliances, and yet to make clear the duty of Christian people to use the ballot against a traffic which is the enemy alike of Church and State.

(9) To make clear the duty and ability of the Church to prohibit and overthrow the liquor traffic whenever she wills.

LIMITATIONS.

(1) The National Inter-Church Temperance Council shall not attempt to commit the Christian Church to any political party nor enter into any election campaign for party candidates.

(2) The National Inter-Church Temperance Council shall be confined in its sphere of operation in accordance with the lines indicated in these articles of agreement. It shall not attempt to legislate for the constituent bodies on the temperance question, but only give expression of its counsel, or recommend a course of action in matters of common interest to the churches and individual Christians. It shall have no authority to limit in any way the full autonomy of the Christian bodies adhering to it in their temperance work. On the other hand, no denomination shall speak for the Council on matters upon which it has not specifically declared itself.

RELATION TO THE FEDERATION OF CHURCHES

It is the purpose of this National Inter-Church Temperance Council to co-operate with the "Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America," as far as our work is related to that of said Federation, and to report to said Federation in addition to reporting to the several denominational bodies forming this National Council.

STEADY HAND.

A SURGEON'S HAND SHOULD BE THE FIRMEST OF ALL.

"For fifteen years I have suffered from insomnia, indigestion and nervousness as a result of coffee drinking," said a surgeon the other day.

"The dyspepsia became so bad that I had to limit myself to one cup at breakfast. Even this caused me to lose my food soon after I ate it.

"All the attendant symptoms of indigestion, such as heart burn, palpitation, water brash, wakefulness or disturbed sleep, bad taste in the mouth, nervousness, etc., were present to such a degree as to incapacitate me for my practice as a surgeon.

"The result of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum was simply marvelous. The change was wrought forthwith, my hand steadied and my normal condition of health was restored." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason." Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

A FARMER'S COLLEGE ON WHEELS.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON TELLS OF A GREAT NEW WORK FOR THE SOUTHERN NEGRO.

The Tuskegee Institute, whose object has always been the uplifting of the masses of the Negroes, has been confronted with the problem of reaching shiftless farmers, writes Booker T. Washington in the December World's Work. It is not enough to get the sons and daughters into the Institute, and teach them useful trades and give them object lessons in good farming; something must be done for the fathers and mothers who cannot come to school. The whole family must be reached if the condition of the race is to be bettered. This problem is being solved, in a large measure, by the Jesup Agricultural Wagon, made possible through the generosity of Morris K. Jesup, a friend of the Institute. The wagon itself and the harness were made at the school by our own students, and two large mules were purchased. The outfit includes different kinds of plows and planters, a cultivator, a cotton chopper, a variety of seeds, samples of fertilizers, a revolving churn, a butter mould, a cream separator, a milk tester, and other appliances useful in making practical demonstrations.

The wagon method has the immense advantage of going direct to the man in the field, where improved methods can be adapted to his particular conditions. We carry our implements out into his field. After he has plowed a few furrows, we hitch up one of our improved plows. "That may be a good plow for some," he says, "but for me, give me that old 'scutter.'" We use our plow for a few minutes and then ask him to compare the amount of work done and the kind of furrow. After that, we can hardly get away from him. They often try to borrow our implements, and one man insisted that we remain at his house until he could plow over his cotton. When we come upon a man slowly plowing out his cornfield, we take out the cultivator and show him that he can make seven furrows where he is making one, and with the same animal. So convincing have these demonstrations been that many have at once bought improved implements. It generally means that boys between the plow handles may stay in school longer.

We often find the farmer's wife and children out in the field scattering fertilizer. A distributor taken from our wagon shows him that there is a quicker and a better way, and his family may at the time be free to do something else. The operator in charge of the Jesup Wagon pays as much attention to the kitchen as to the field, for experience has shown us that the wife must be taught as well as the husband, if real advancement is to be made.

After the Jesup Wagon has in this way made the rounds of the large and small farms of a community, a mass-meeting is held in the open air at some central point.

Do not loiter or shirk,

Do not falter or shrink;

But just think out your work,

And then work out your "think."

HISTORICAL JOURNAL.

The first number of the fourth volume of the "Journal of Friends' Historical Society," dated First month, 1907, has a number of articles of special interest to American Friends. "The American Letters of Edmund Peckover" "give a touching insight into the inner feelings of a traveling minister not often revealed in printed journals, a tender love to family and friends, a longing for news from the home-land, and a happy prospect of return when the right time should come. Many of the Friends referred to are mentioned in Albert Cook Myers' 'Hannah Logan's Courtship.'" "The Collection of Friends' Books in the Library of Haverford College" is discussed by Allen C. Thomas. At present the collection consists of about 2,000 volumes, and 1,000 unbound pamphlets. With few exceptions the collection is strictly that of books written by Friends, or others, on subjects directly connected with the Society. The leading article in the "Journal," is on "John Whiting" (1656-1723), the first of a series on "Our Bibliographers." This Friend was the first to attempt a catalogue of the writings of the founders of the Society. His work, with supplements, occupies 238 pages. The book contains the abbreviated titles, names of authors, dates of issue, size and the number of sheets of the productions of early Friends. A few biographical notes are interspersed. This gives some idea of the great number of documents produced

A Prayer for Guidance.

Lead me, yea, lead me deeper into life,
This suffering, human life wherein thou liv'st
And breathe'st still, and hold'st thy way Divine.
'Tis here, O pitying Christ, where thee I seek,
Here where the strife is fiercest; where the sun
Beats down upon the highway thronged with men,
And in the raging mart. O deeper lead
My soul into the living world of souls
Where thou dost move.

But lead me, Man Divine,
Where'er thou will'st, only that I may find
At the long journey's end thy image there,
And grow more like to it. For art not thou
The human shadow of infinite Love,
That made and fills the endless universe?
The very Word of him, the unseen, unknown,
Eternal Good that rules the summer flower,
And all the worlds that people starry space?

Easiest-Reading Bible

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink running from Genesis to Revelation binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under a mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere Bible reader are brought to light and tied together. In the "International"

Christian Workers' Bible

the Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority on Bible themes, has arranged on this plan

Three Thousand Selected Texts

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class but for all who read the Scriptures.

Prominent people's opinions of the Christian Workers' Bible:

JOHN WANAMAKER: I have received the marvelously beautiful and complete work—"International Christian Workers' Bible." It is an advance of anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable for Christian Workers.

LYMAN ABBOTT: This edition will be valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible on great spiritual themes directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries and theological treatises.

REV. JAMES A. WORDEN, D. D., LL. D., Supt. Sabbath-School Training, Presbyterian Board of Sunday-School Work: In this beautiful "International" Christian Workers' Bible, a specimen of the finest typography, I have a complete copy of the Scriptures accurately and tastefully marked, according to the very best ideas of Bible marking.

Doctor Hurlbut has been especially happy in deciding upon those passages which treat of the theme of salvation, and upon his division of this general theme into classes. I went through the Christian Workers' Bible testing the accuracy of the classification, and I found it complete in every instance.

These beautiful printed red lines and letters are guides to the great temple of the Bible. This volume must prove a treasure to all Sabbath-school teachers, to all Y. M. C. A. members, and also to the members of the Epworth League or Christian Endeavor, and, indeed, to all Bible readers.

C. B. BLACKALL, Editor of Periodicals, American Baptist Pub'n Society: It seems to me this Bible is indispensable. It seems to be lacking in nothing either mechanical or otherwise as a practical aid.

The Christian Workers' Bible is bound in fine Morocco, Divinity Circuit, with overlapping edges; round corners, gold edges with red underneath. Size of page, 8 1/2 x 5 1/4 inches, beautifully printed in large, clear type on extra fine paper.

The Christian Workers' Bible will be SENT FREE for examination, all charges prepaid.

ONE MORE SERIOUS CALL.

It is not the mission of THE AMERICAN FRIEND to carry on a warfare with other religious journals. It has never been a controversial paper, and it will not descend to that level now. Like Nehemiah of old, it is "doing a great work, and cannot come down" We have been presenting, to the best of our light, a type of Christianity which is apostolic and spiritual, and which will, in time, prevail. Those who are ready for it, and who appreciate its power and reality, are rallying, and will rally to it, and support it. Every year will see it grow and strengthen, and we can afford to wait, calm and unmoved, for the years to mature and ripen it. We have no controversy with any man or woman who has a different type of faith from the one which seems to us to fit the Eternal Nature of Things. Religious faith is a very sacred matter, and not an affair to be settled by hatchet and blunderbus. A man is bound to hold to a faith which fits his deepest life-needs until he finds that it is inadequate and incomplete. And we have no bricks to throw at the person whose faith seems less adequate than our own. If we cannot convince him that we have found the true apostolic and spiritual religion, he will have to go on his way without us until he comes to see what we see. A religion condemns itself when it sinks to the level of propagating itself and defending itself by other methods than straightforward methods of evidence and persuasion. Those who have eyes to see, will see the truth, if it is sincerely presented, and those who have ears to hear, will hear. We have no anxiety for anything, except for wisdom to tell our truth wisely and well. The outcome is as sure as the law of gravitation.

We cannot, however, now ignore the fact that we are passing through a crisis, which is to decide forever whether our branch of the Church is to have a future of power and influence, or is to run off into emotionalism and ranterism. There would be no danger, if only Friends knew the real meaning of the present situation. If they once saw the destructive and disintegrating character of the movement which could prepare the way for the outbreak of tongues and for attempts to cast out devils in Ohio, the air would be cleared and the outlook would brighten. The danger lies in dallying and in ignorance, so that it seems to us an urgent duty to sound a solemn warning against the entire movement, which is playing havoc wherever it breaks out.

There is not a single yearly meeting which has not suffered in one or more localities from this radical movement. It has divided meetings; it has driven away solid, thoughtful persons; it has produced a class of Friends out of sympathy with the great educational and constructive work of the Society. The outbreak of tongues and the attempts to cast out devils, which gained such a newspaper notoriety, are not as serious features as the outbreaks of ranterism, which have, for years, been desolating various sections of our Church. It is all very well to discipline poor Levi Lupton, who was the occasion of this outbreak, but he is a normal product of the movement. Only a few weeks ago a minister of this school, in a public meeting, got up and stood on top of the desk on the minister's platform. Next he got up and stood on the Bible lying on the desk. Then he took off his coat and vest, and pulled off his suspenders. "Now," he cried, "I am free of all straps and bands." This is the normal outcome of the kind of teaching the man had received. He had no way of discerning a false impression of duty from a true one. A "leading" was to him a "leading," and he was doing as he had heard his teachers say he ought to do. With a conciseness which leaves nothing to be desired, one of the evangelists of this movement has formulated the principle which has again and again been put in practice. He says, "When I go into a revival meeting, I unscrew my head and throw it under a bench. I have no use for anything above my collar-button."

It is the practical outcome of this business which, alone, concerns us. It is as unsafe as an unhitched cyclone, and those who know any history will not play with this wild fire, even where it seems only a harmless spark. Those who have been the leaders and champions of this radical wing of Quakerism have assumed that they are the guardians of evangelical faith; they have persistently attacked those who did not use their pet phrases. They have circulated insidious rumors; they have spread unfounded suspicions and charges, to undermine men of influence, and they have laid far-reaching plans to get control of our entire Church and winnow it to their liking. It is a calamity which will not happen, but this is no time to sit on the fence. It would be a splendid service if every evangelistic superintendent would prepare for his coming yearly meeting a sketch of the havoc which has been wrought in his territory by outbreaks of ranterism, and trace them to their source.

EDITORIAL LETTER.

I have come back from my extended lecture trip to the Friends' college centres with a feeling of hope and courage. The colleges I visited—Wilmington, Friends' University, Penn and Earlham—are steadily growing in power and influence, and increasing in financial endowment and equipment. The effect of the college was plainly apparent in every one of these centres. I could feel the broadened outlook, the openness of mind, the enlarged horizon, and the quickened power of appreciation.

My audiences were large at every place. The total attendance was largest in Wilmington, though the Richmond morning meeting of about 800 was the largest single audience that I addressed. The average attendance throughout was more than three hundred persons. In each section a goodly number came in from outlying places. Great numbers of persons told me that they never before heard a lecture on the "Message of Early Quakerism," and that they had no idea what the primitive Friends taught. This lecture was received everywhere with keen interest, and, to my surprise, was appreciated even more than the ones that I thought would be popular. My experience with this course of lectures has fully convinced me that a great work can be done by extending this lectureship plan. There were many requests from other centres for the lectures, and an entire winter could easily have been spent repeating them in localities where Friends are numerous.

Young Friends everywhere, whether college students or not, were decidedly responsive and were all ready for the message I gave. There is a solid, positive religious influence in every one of these colleges. The students show marked interest in things of the spirit, and, by the right sort of effort, can be drawn into constructive work within their own denomination. The Friends I met are tired and sick of attacks on education and of attempts to carry the Church into a type of effervescent Christianity.

They want, and are determined to have, a solid, steady, edifying religion, good to live by at every height of intellectual attainment. If these four centres of Quakerism could be taken as samples of the field at large, there would be every reason for confidence. As soon as a Friend gains an open mind, learns to think, gets an historical outlook and can feel the difference between spiritual power and religious effervescence, he is ready to volunteer in the service of promoting a type of Quakerism which will do for our age what primitive Quakerism did for the seventeenth century. The colleges are the key and will largely settle the problem for us.

TOWARD PEACE.*

BY HANNAH W. CADBURY.

I had read in books, and it had been told me, how in the universe, at intervals of time as yet inconceivable, there occur certain mighty changes among the stars; and that these changes, according to scientists, while yet seeming so necessary to the universal harmony, take place in a manner so violent that our poor imagination (be it repeated once more), can never conceive of them in all their awful majesty.

Books and teachers had told me, also, how these violent changes—still according to the scientists—are yet necessary for the readjustment of geological strata, rendered more or less unstable by the slow, incessant processes of evolution.

What wonder, then, that I, still a boy, should believe war to be one of those good means whereby new generations are readjusted to new laws?

It was for this, and for other reasons of secondary importance, that I enrolled in the service of the navy, believing that I was choosing a career just as I might have chosen any other. Or, rather, that I was choosing a career more worthy than any other, because by this, if nothing else, I was voluntarily sacrificing myself to the hard life of the military marine, in the desire to hold myself ever peculiarly ready to fight valiantly, to conquer or to die—for the peace and safety of the aged, of women and of children, as well as for the peace of those who, in those times of peril, would continue to produce what was necessary for the bodily needs of the large majority of the great national family.

Why did my thought change in this regard?

It is difficult to say. The more I seek, the more I find that there have been so many factors in that change, that, in seeking to enumerate them, I should fear to be so wearisome, and, at the same time so incomplete, as to feel remorse for the attempt.

I will abandon that task, therefore, and will allow myself only to say that, on the whole, little by little, there took predominance in me the conviction that military institutions, as they are organized in all the world to-day, were—and are—too much in contrast with that inward manifestation, which I, ever more from day to day, feel to be the only true Guide of a divine nature in making my decisions between my right and duty.

Long and very hard was the struggle. To heed that inward manifestation, to follow the new ideal, must I cut short, at one stroke, a career along whose way I had left the flower of my youth; upon whose path I was, within the bounds of possibility, already victorious, encouraged by the good wishes of many friends, and esteemed even by enemies?

And then, are we not, according to the so-called scientists, more or less the slaves of habit? Or, rather, is not habit the most essential part of our earthly life?

But then! why enumerate all the fearsome obstacles, great and small, which continually—inexorably at times—and for so long, presented themselves before my mind, from the day in which this mind of mine, thanks to a deepening of thought, was being liberated more and more from the slavery of the influence of environment, and thus was being uplifted into the feeling that it had become, in some way, a part of Power when it became half conscious of that Inner Guide, known in the world, by some, as Conscience, and as God by others?

No, I shall not enumerate these obstacles. In this, also, I should be afraid of being wearisome and quite unequal to the task.

That which it is important to know is that, in this struggle so long and hard, the new ideal, the inward manifestation, conquered. Exercise increased in me the power of thought, and with the increase of thought the independence of my spirit—or, if you prefer it, of my mind—also increased.

In becoming conscious of this uplift, the mind soared far above the bewildering shadows that pervade the lower levels, where counting the cost holds the majority of human minds, and—and was set free in the spheres of light: in regions where, since distinctions no longer exist between physical possessions, either individual or collective, and where, since there no longer exist grounds for argument or differences of race, creed or color, there no longer exist, either, cannon and other instruments of destruction manufactured by a portion of the human race for those scourges of humanity, called wars, which are to-day so coolly arranged for by professionals in the military schools or in the offices of the politicians of business. And—and as, thirteen years before, I had said to the ideal fatherland: "I have only my life-blood freely to offer thee—take it;" so now, in the day of the high vision, of spiritual independence, although with this I felt still more around me only the Providential care and foresight, instead of falling back (as I had done so many times before), I now felt the strength to throw myself upon this Providence and say: "My desire is to dedicate that which remains of myself to the triumph of the Inward Guide Who has raised me to this faith in Thee—far above all human counting of the cost—where a sense of peace so sweetly mingled with love and justice satisfied, lures me to the hope that I am indeed in tune with the Infinite, where I feel that only desires to do good, to make happy all people and all things that I meet upon my way, blossom in me. To Thee I entrust myself. Take me!" And, from being a marine and a soldier, I came forth free, a citizen of the whole world.

HAS THE GOSPEL RUN OUT?

BY THEO. L. CUYLER.

Recently a very able and influential daily paper declared that "there is an impression in some quarters that the Bible is not in touch with these modern times, that its possibilities have been exhausted, and that in order to retain its hold on the masses, the Church must more closely align itself with liberal and advanced thinking." The editor goes on to say that a search of newspaper files for six months past would show what an enormous number of sermons have been on "social and secular topics, and that these ministers are presumably afraid that if they confine themselves to the Gospel they will be accused of want of progressiveness."

It is not often that such sensible counsels to ministers are found in the columns of a secular journal. They are timely also. There is an increasing rage for "sociology," and many ministers are tempted to give an undue prominence to the discussion of problems that belong to social science and political economy. The Bible does, indeed, contain the seed-corn principles from which all wise social reforms must spring. It teaches with divine authority the brotherhood of man, the duty of the strong to provide for the weak, the necessity of honest dealings and honest wages, the stewardship of money, the claims of temperance and Christian charity, and the duties that belong to Christian citizenship. No wise minister will ignore entirely these pressing and practical questions, and when he does occasionally discuss them, he ought to do so with fearless plainness of speech.

But God's Word goes a great many leagues deeper than any problems of social philosophy. It goes to the root of things. It strikes down into the depraved human heart as the source of all sins and the wrongs and the sorrows and the sufferings that exist in this present evil world. Satan's throne is in the unregenerate heart; and out of that heart proceed the evil thoughts, the cruelties, the adulteries, the thefts, the murders, the falsehoods, and all the swarm of mischiefs and miseries that afflict society. Christ's Gospel is the only remedy that can reach the heart; and therefore it is the one chief and foremost duty of every Christian minister to preach and to press home that heaven-sent Gospel upon every conscience. Jesus Christ, the healer of sick bodies, came into this world chiefly to save sin-sick souls. He preached heart-repentance and holy living. Paul and his fellow apostles did not go about lecturing on sociologies, even in that corrupt age. They grappled with the mightier problem of man's utter heart-depravity and struck for nothing less than putting Jesus Christ into men's souls, and their entire regeneration by the Holy Spirit. That is the prime office of the Gospel of redemption. The wisdom and the power of this glorious Gospel lies right here. And what business, my dear brethren, have you or I to be scratching on the surface of things, when the Holy Spirit commissions us and charges us to go down to the roots of all evil things? The wonder-working Gospel of atonement, faith, regeneration and supporting grace—which is God's masterpiece—has no more run out than the law of gravitation has run out, and is no more "antiquated" than are fresh air and sunshine.

And an admirable object lesson for all ministers may be found in the successful career of Richard Baxter, in the manufacturing town of Kidderminster. When he came there the town was overrun with wickedness. He did not ignore the bodily needs of his parishioners; for he had great skill in medicine and great assiduity in caring for the sick. He did not ignore their domestic and social conditions; for he labored for the cleanliness and comfort of their homes. His chief aim was the salvation of their souls; as he honored the Gospel, God honored him and gave him a great baptism of spiritual power. After several years of genuine apostolic labors, Kidderminster was not only reformed; it was revolutionized. New hearts made new homes and a new state of society. Baxter said that instead of profanity and drunkenness and Sabbath-breaking, he could walk the streets on Sabbath evening and hear the sounds of psalms or Bible reading in well-nigh every dwelling!

Human nature—whether in mansion or in hovel—has not changed since Baxter's day, or since the apostles' day. Christianity has not changed, and never will change. It provides for the life that now is, and infinitely more for the life that is to come. The infinite God knew what He was doing when He gave to His sinning, suffering children a Gospel that renovates the whole man through the incoming of Christ Jesus into the heart. To His ministers He entrusts this life-giving Gospel—not to be altered or overlaid or veneered, much less to be apologized for or concealed. The sublime purpose of this Gospel is to bring God to man and man to God. Its two principles—as Pascal well said—are the corruption of human nature and its redemption by Jesus Christ. As time can never "antiquate" these two principles, the precious Gospel is as fresh and as strong, and as indispensable and as powerful, as when it thundered from the lips of Paul. Woe be to this world if the Gospel runs out.

HOW TO CREATE AN INTEREST IN EXTENDING THE KINGDOM.*

BY OLIVE ROBBINS HAVILAND.

I suppose our problem is not unlike that which is found the world over—how to interest Christians in the work of Christ. The general attitude of our meetings towards missions is not one of sympathy. We must acknowledge that in the vocabulary of the Friend, the words "evangelize" and "missionary" have had far too little place. We must confess that there has been a lack of vital interest in missionary work. We have been so occupied in our own Jerusalem that we have not gone to the uttermost parts of the earth.

The cause of missions, then, must be so presented that its largeness may be seen. There is a spirit so high, so broad, so free, so strong, that it can escape all the narrow bounds of creed, all the petty wilfulness of natural desires, all the stubbornness born of ignorance, all the shallowness of traditionalism, and spend itself in giving and being given; a spirit which makes no distinction between that which is near and that which is far, that which is easy and that which is difficult, that which is new and that which is old, but which has for its animus Christ, and for its ideal the carrying out of His plans to help humanity reach its highest development. The soul animated by this spirit will have the vision of the need of a world of men; will devote itself to a study of the present, not to a blind worship of the past; will look forward, not backward; will not fear to mar the orthodoxy of its ritual in upholding the great truths of Christianity; will hear the cry that goes out from India, and China, and Africa, and Japan, and all the Christless world, and will rejoice in being able to follow the apostle's command, "Endure affliction, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry."

Dean Vaughan says, "Know and you will feel. Know and you will help. Know and you will pray. You will be ashamed of the sluggishness, of the isolation, of the selfishness which has made you think only of your own people and your father's house." Here we believe is the key to our problem. It is through a knowledge of conditions, a knowledge of human need, a knowledge of our own obligations, that we may hope to lead our missionary life to sovereign power. If once we can get the world awake to the facts, if minds can be opened to an intellectual perception of the work of missions, if the eye can see and the ear can hear, then the heart will feel and the hand will do. Intelligent appreciation of the facts must precede the truest kind of service. Our campaign, then, is one of education. As knowledge increases, prejudice, superstition, traditionalism, will vanish, and we shall realize that we are following a light which shines more and more unto the perfect day. When we no longer talk of human brotherhood, but are brothers, indeed; when we not merely pray Thy Kingdom come, but work with hope and courage for its coming; when once we realize that all human agencies for the extension of God's Kingdom are used of Him as instruments to bring righteousness upon the earth, and that their object is to give human sympathy and support to those who feel the divine call to carry the Gospel even to the uttermost parts—then, indeed, can we more truly feel the power and sweetness of Christ's words, "For I was an hungered, and ye gave Me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave Me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took Me in; naked, and ye clothed Me; I was sick, and ye visited Me; I was in prison, and ye came unto Me."

We need to quietly watch for opportunities to increase knowledge, and hence interest and to tactfully make use of these opportunities. Some interesting bit of information given to the friend you chance to meet who has no time for missions, some items from our workers in far-away lands, some extracts from letters that have come from our missionaries, some news about our own local organization—the last meeting, who was there, what the program was, who came to talk to us from a neighboring town, how much money we are raising for the support of our girl in Japan, how many garments we made at our last sewing meeting—all this missionary gossip may have its place in arousing some one whose interest needs to be quickened.

The presence of visiting missionaries in our midst is surely one of the best ways to increase interest in the work. I believe, for this reason if for no other, missionaries should be given frequent furloughs that they may bring their work into contact with the home land, and thus make facts of vital significance.

I have sometimes thought our First-day schools might help the cause of missions in the meetings. Yet we must realize that often these schools have a struggling existence, and it might be unwise to add to their burdens. The very fact that so much has been done in the last few years for the growth and extension of Bible study, should encourage us to press forward in a study of missions.

We are accustomed to speak of the work of the individual and the work of the Church in helping mankind realize itself, but the importance of the home and its influence or inactivity is not properly appreciated. Here, where love and faith and loyalty are first matured, where wisdom and knowledge are first cherished, the fires of missionary zeal should burn so brightly that their warmth and cheer would reach neighboring homes and meetings.

Missionary literature, such as the biographies of men and women who have given their lives to work on foreign fields, the history of Christian development, the study of religions which our religion is to illuminate—all these may be factors in the home for increasing interest.

In concluding, I should be untrue to myself did I not speak my earnest conviction that it is a higher spiritual atmosphere, a broader and deeper Christianity, we need to arouse a love for the whole world. That, while knowledge will help us, love will help us infinitely more, and that the prayer of each heart for himself and his meeting, should be, "More love, O Christ, to Thee."

For so, by prayer, the whole round earth is every way Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

Lansdowne, Pa.

THE POWER OF A QUIET MIND.

In the crowded aisles of the huge department store men and women were pressing eagerly about the counters. Christmas was almost at hand, and many gifts were to be bought for loved ones at home and far away. Many a face was brighter and cheerier than on other days in the year; yet, many a face looked out through the crowd with frowns and anxious, troubled glances from eyes that snapped with impatience.

It was a restless, moving crowd, now eddying turbulently where broad aisles crossed, now drifting in long lanes reaching as far as the eye could see, breaking into waves and rapids, flowing hither and thither without a moment's rest.

In sharp contrast to the scenes along the busy aisles was the scene within a small room high up in a corner of the building. There, with a single helper near him, sat a man, who, to all appearances, might be quietly reflecting on a philosophical problem that had just occurred to him. He was talking with a visitor—talking as though in his home library on a winter's night; talking in a low voice, whose cadences betrayed not the least commotion within. He was not wasting words. Every word counted. And there was no hurry, no jostling or unruly thoughts, but a steadiness that told of a curbed and disciplined mind. No man in all the city was more quiet in demeanor, more easily urbane, more orderly and patient in word and look, than this man, whose toiling, driving, overcoming mind had invented the processes, planned the workings, and designed the attractiveness of a colossal mart, where human needs are so met that the restless, happy, anxious crowd is drawn thither without quite knowing why it is so.

That steady, low-voiced, watchful man in the small room is a contradiction to the popular notion of high efficiency. The world looks for bustle and stir beneath the accomplished big result, and measures a man's efficiency by the number of motions he makes, rather than by the number of useful motions he can lead others to make. But the mind that achieves is the quiet mind, the mind that is not flurried by events or its own activities. And the quiet mind is in itself an achievement which must precede such work as we may do at our best.

Clear thought is not possible to the mind that is clouded by flurry. The business man who faces a great opportunity cannot lay hold of it with a masterful grip if he allows himself to become too excitedly interested in the gains, which he thinks he sees just beyond the stroke. He must steady his thoughts by hard work on the problem before him. The man who faces a crisis in his affairs can easily become helpless by dwelling nervously on the crisis, and fail to win through it, not from lack of average ability, but from sheer lack of steadiness and quiet thinking. The minister can take a sermon-germ, nourish it into life, and then kill it by mental uneasiness over what he vaguely fears may be its effect on his people.

Nowhere is the power of a quiet mind more definitely felt than in the home circle. The father who rises in the morning, anxious and not rested, looking ahead apprehensively to a day of events not to his liking, can throw the home life for that day into a fit of the blues which the brightest sunlight cannot drive away. Or, if he so chooses, he can quietly go about his day's duties in so steady and hopeful a fashion that his dear ones will share throughout that day the spirit in which he began it. The mother, with her crowding duties and numberless interruptions, her countless steps about the house, and with a mind full of the ever-recurring problems of child-training which she is not to discuss wisely before a mothers' meeting, but must settle on the spot—that mother can, by an unquiet mind, make needless problems for herself, double her burdens, and ruin the joyousness of life which should be her children's daily portion. Or, she can learn the art of quietness, keep the family in balance by her own poise, and move steadily on from one duty to another, refusing to be deprived of the power which comes with quietness of mind.

What is true of the home where this power is found is true of every circle of life's relationships. Good work and worry do not go together, clear thought and flurry cannot dwell together in the same mind at the same time. And, in his plans and purposes for his children, God has ever given prominence to the power which comes from a mind steadily holding to its appointed tasks, in restful, yet ever-achieving trust in him.

When David charged his son, Solomon, to build a house for Jehovah, the God of Israel, he said to him: "As for me, it was in my heart to build a house unto the name of Jehovah, my God. But the word of Jehovah came to me, saying, 'Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars; thou shalt not build a house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight. Behold, a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about; for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. He shall build a house for my name; and he shall be my son, and I will be his father.'" And David, himself, humbled in spirit, and seeing deeply into life's secrets after many bitter experiences, cried out: "Jehovah, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; * * * Surely, I have stilled and quieted my soul; like a weaned child with his mother, like a weaned child, is my soul within me. O, Israel, hope in Jehovah from this time forth and for evermore."

Thus the Preacher, when he had seen how man is envied of his neighbor for skilful work, which "is vanity and a striving after wind," utters his conclusion: "Better is a handful, with quietness, than two handfuls with labor and striving after wind." Or, again, "Wisdom is better than strength; * * * The words of the wise heard in quiet are better than the cry of him that ruleth among fools."

When Ahaz was in dire distress in the fear of Rezin and Pekah, Jehovah directed Isaiah to say unto Ahaz, "Take heed, and be quiet; fear not, neither let thy heart be faint, because of these two tails of smoking firebrands. * * * If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established." And, when the same prophet threatened the people for their trust in Egypt, he reproached them with the charge: "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength. And ye would not."

The New Testament has a like message again and again, and nowhere more impressively than in the story of the life of Jesus. He was busy, but never hurried; harassed, but never impatient. Faced with social and religious problems of the most complex kind, yet never for a moment other than quietly clear in His answers. He pressed home His message with unparalleled vigor, disregarding the consequences to Himself, save as He needed to secure by reasonable care the opportunity to utter the truth whenever and wherever it would count for the most. The steadiness of Christ among adverse currents, even among His friends; His majestic calm as a storm center of controversy or bitter hatred, were not to be His achievement alone; such power as this He taught His disciples to gain, even as we can gain it, through Him. Lacking the power of a quiet mind, which was also in Christ Jesus, we lack what we can have at the cost of letting go our nervous forebodings, our petty, fussy, hurrying anxieties which have no rightful place in the life of any child of God. With a mind at rest in God, and yet working tirelessly at the tasks He has set for us, we shall waste no time or tissue over the things that our un-Christian forebodings create, but we shall work, perhaps for the first time in our lives, with the power of a quiet mind free to do its utmost.

"Dear Lord and Father of mankind,
Forgive our feverish ways!
Reclothe us in our rightful mind;
In purer lives thy service find,
In deeper reverence, praise,

"Drop thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of thy peace.

"Breathe through the hearts of our desire
Thy coolness and thy balm;
Let sense be dumb, let flesh retire:
Speak through the earthquake, wind and fire,
O still small voice of calm!"

Learn these two things: never be discouraged because good things get on so slowly here, and never fail daily to do that good which lies next to your hand.—George Macdonald.

If we cannot live so as to be happy, let us at least live so as to deserve happiness.—Fichte.

SELF-DENIAL.

Those of us who have attended Friends' meeting for nearly half a century, heard, during our youth, many sermons on self-denial. These were preached by women whose lives of purity and devotion were almost nun-like in their seclusion from the world, or by men, either of saint-like tenderness or stern and severe virtue, who never seemed to feel the need of amusement or relaxation.

These sermons on self-denial were usually full of quotations from the Scriptures, and not very specific in character, but we generally interpreted them to mean that we should observe "plainness of speech, behavior and apparel," after the manner of Friends.

We listened—we guilty ones—either with resentment or self-reproach, the strength of which was determined by the intensity of our desires for fashion, music, and the ways of the world. Yet we could not fail to receive the impression that the question we should ask ourselves in regard to any line of conduct was not "What do I want to do?" but "What ought I to do?"

To-day, we do not hear so many sermons on self-denial, but in this era of luxury, of self-indulgence, of wandering at will in pleasant paths, do we not need a living and powerful restatement of that Quaker doctrine, which brought forth those lives of self-control and strict adherence to duty, which, in many of the generation now almost passed away, aroused both our reverence and our wonder?

In the changed conditions which now surround us, the "guarded education," the peculiar and protective customs of dress and language, the restriction of society to a selected circle, seem, in most cases, impossible to attain. In the general catholicity of feeling which characterizes our era, many of us are not able to believe such exclusiveness even desirable. We must test both our philosophy and our religion in the "open road."

Yet, still, through the ages, come echoing down the never-to-be-forgotten words, "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me."

The problem before the Friend to-day is to be "in the world, yet not of the world," and to apply the principle of self-denial, not by a drawing aside of garments, but in sympathetic touch with all humanity, demonstrating that life may be rich, joyous, and varied, yet simple, sincere, and self-controlled.

The self-denial which is ascetic in character, can not meet the needs of this practical age. We must be positive, not negative. In so doing, we shall be following the example of Jesus, who did not say, "I must not," but "I must"—"I must work the works of Him that sent Me." "I must preach the Kingdom of God." "The Son of man must suffer." This compelling "must" is the note of Christ's life on earth, and should be that of those who follow Him.

It is the tendency of the time to think we may do as we choose, only refraining from that which is absolutely wrong; but the follower of Christ, ever pressing forward towards the highest, must leave by the way whatever may delay or hinder his progress, and whatever may interfere with the coming of the Kingdom of God, even though it may not seem wrong in itself.

Let us then once more preach self-denial—the self-denial that, moving to and fro in life's common way, never forgets that at all times and in all places, we must be about our Father's business. R.

The International Lesson.

FIRST QUARTER.

LESSON IX.

THIRD MONTH 3, 1907.

ABRAHAM PLEADING FOR SODOM.

Genesis 18: 16-33.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Men ought always to pray, and not to faint. Luke 18: 1.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Second mo. 25.—Abraham pleading for Sodom. Gen. 18: 16-33.

Third-day, Second mo. 26.—Character of Sodom. Gen. 13: 5-18.

Fourth-day, Second mo. 27.—Lot rescued. Gen. 19: 12-17.

Fifth-day, Second mo. 28.—Sodom destroyed. Gen. 19: 23-29.

Sixth-day, Third mo. 1.—Worse than Sodom. Matt. 11: 20-26.

Seventh-day, Third mo. 2.—Christ's warnings. Luke 17: 26-33.

First-day, Third mo. 3.—An ensample. II Pet. 2: 4-9.

Time.—As before, uncertain, but possibly about fifteen or twenty years after the last lesson.

Place.—The oaks (or terebinths) of Mamre, near Hebron. Lot was living in Sodom.

Persons.—Abraham, represented as ninety-nine years old; Sarah, eighty-nine; Jehovah, and two angels.

The verses preceding the lesson should be read. They present an attractive picture of eastern hospitality.

16. "And the men rose up." To take their departure. "Looked toward Sodom." The Dead Sea is distant from Hebron only about 18 miles, and from an elevation it can be seen distinctly. "To bring them on their way." In accordance with Oriental hospitality and custom, Abraham would accompany his guests for a part of the way. Compare Gen. 12: 20.

17. "Said." In his heart, or, as we should put it, said to himself. Compare Ex. 13: 17, "Shall I hide?" Amos 3: 7.

18. "Seeing," etc. As Abraham was to occupy so important a place in the world's religious history, and was also so true and noble a character, it might be well for him to see clearly the difference between God's treatment of righteousness and unrighteousness.

19. The American Revised Version is to be preferred here. "For I have known him, to the end that he may command his children and his household after him, that they may keep the way of Jehovah, to do righteousness and justice; to the end that Jehovah may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him." God hath appeared to Abraham that he may be the founder of a great nation—the purpose of God's appearing, that through him and his family and descendants the true knowledge of God may be perpetuated. Abraham's obedience to God's commands is the necessary condition of the fulfillment of God's promises.

20. "The cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great."

The loud and persistent report of the wickedness of these cities—the cry about Sodom and Gomorrah, which had ascended to Heaven.

21. "I will go down now and see." Note how Jehovah is represented as a human being would be; as if it were needful for him to visit the places to see if the report was accurate.

22. "And the men turned from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before Jehovah." Amer. R. V. Two of the visitors went on (see Gen. 19:1): one remained, who was Jehovah. Though it is not related how Abraham recognized who his visitor was. The account of the interview, which follows, is one of the most striking accounts of Scripture for clearness and vividness.

23. "Wilt thou consume the righteous with the wicked?" It is a characteristic of human nature to expect that the powerful and above-all, God, will be just. Abraham seems to think that all will have to be destroyed, or all saved.

24. Abraham presents his plea with humility and diffidence. Lot must have been in his mind, and possibly he may have thought that some were influenced by Lot.

25. "To slay the righteous with the wicked." This was surely not justice; how could a God of justice act so? "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Literally, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do judgment?" That is, justice. If He does not act with justice, who can be expected to?

26. The Lord yields to Abraham's request and agrees to save the city, if 50 righteous men can be found in it.

27. Abraham now begins to doubt whether there are 50 such men in Sodom, and, fearful lest Lot and other possible righteous men should perish, makes a still greater request, expressing his humility at the same time. "Dust and ashes." "He looketh upon the power of the height of Heaven: and all men are earth and ashes." Eccles. 17:32.

28-32. Abraham drops from 50 to 45, then to 40, then to 20, and then to 10. Compare Jer. 5:1. It seems rather strange that nowhere does Abraham plead for mercy; justice, and only justice of a comparatively limited nature, is what he asks for. It turned out that there were not even 10 righteous men in Sodom, and so, in one sense, Abraham's pleading went for naught. But God was not only fully as just as Abraham expected, but He was merciful also, for Lot's wife and daughters were saved, and his sons-in-law (or those who were to be his sons-in-law. See margin), might have been saved had they believed Lot, and Zoar was preserved. Gen. 19:12-22. See Also Ex. 34:6, 7. The exact site of Sodom and Gomorrah is not determined; they were probably at the southern end of the Dead Sea.

33. "Communing." Conversing. "Returned unto his place." Went back to his tents.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Abraham's petition was wholly for others.

2. "What are men,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer,
Both for themselves and those whom they call friend."
3. Hebrews 13:2.

TOPIC FOR THIRD MONTH THIRD, 1907.

BEING HONEST WITH YOURSELF AND GOD.

Luke 12: 1-3; Josh. 24: 14. (Consecration Meeting.)

Second-day, Second mo. 25.—Honest with our Judge. Ps. 7: 3-9.

Third-day, Second mo. 26.—Square dealing rewarded. Isa. 33: 15-18.

Fourth-day, Second mo. 27.—"Live and let live." Ezek. 18: 5-9.

Fifth-day, Second mo. 28.—Honest with our conscience. Rom. 14: 5-23.

Sixth-day, Third mo. 1.—Honest as employees. Col. 3: 22-25.

Seventh-day, Third mo. 2.—Honest in conduct. I Pet. 2: 11-16.

Honesty is a much-abused virtue. Men boast of being honest in the same breath that they acknowledge their shortcomings along other lines of morality, and even propose to offset their confessed defects with this vaunted goodness. But paying one's money debts and keeping one's word are not the sum total of honesty. "Owe no man anything but to love one another," wrote the apostle, and honesty requires the payment of the debt of love to our fellowman no less surely than it does that we should pay our month's grocer's bill or house rent, or the wages of our employees.

"Abram called to be a blessing," is the title of a recent lesson in our Sabbath-school. What he was to be or to become, was not a mere matter of choice with him—his obedience a work of supererogation, or his disobedience a matter of indifference. He owed it to God and to his fellows to take the place for which his marvelous opportunities had prepared him. Honesty demanded that he repay to God in the manner of His appointment the debt into which he had come, because of the privileges which he had enjoyed. But "Who art thou that judgest another?" Are not our light and the sum of our revelations vastly greater than were Abraham's? And does God mean that we should be less truly, even if less conspicuously, a blessing than was Abraham?

Conversation with the employers of thousands of workmen brings out the fact that eye-service is no less a disease of to-day than when Paul wrote. Men that would scorn to take money or goods, purloin the employer's time and pocket the pay without hesitation. Others must be watched to keep from stealing for fuel—where fuel is abundant—the valuable appliances with which they are entrusted. There seems to some to be a wide division between the two classes; but when the light shines in and reveals every secret, how far apart will they be?

The most successful of all dissimulations is the pretense of love. Love toward God, or—what is its essential expression—toward our fellowman, rings false to the ear to which it is addressed, as well as to the heart of him who professes it, unless it is grounded in truth. And since love is the key to the Kingdom, he who fails here can but fail of his hope of salvation, no matter what he may profess with his lips.

Dishonesty with our neighbor may bring us to the bar of justice; but the outwardly moral man who is dishonest with himself, and who shuns the reckonings of his own conscience, is trifling with the supreme stake—the discharge of his intrusted duty in the world, and the eternal welfare of his soul.

Missionary Department.

[Communications for this department should be addressed to The Editor, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.]

FROM THE FRIENDS' AFRICA INDUSTRIAL MISSION.

Some time ago a missionary who has labored among Africans for many years visited us. He was asked to speak in our services, and we were much interested in observing his text, and the line of thought which he would present to a people who have had so brief a time to hear of the Divine message.

We are always glad of any practical points to be gained from the wider experience of older workers, and it is the missionary who most thoroughly understands the native mind, and methods of reasoning, that can best present the truths of the Gospel of Christ to him.

And this is the text we first heard this missionary use: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye shall love one another."

What teaching could be more simple and more easily understood, and yet the Great Teacher found it wise to emphasize the necessity of brotherly love when meeting with His disciples one of the last days before His crucifixion. If those who had had the precious privilege of intimate association with the Lord Himself, needed this parting admonition, how much more is there a tremendous need that these heathens, who know not the meaning of the word "to love" in its deeper sense; how much greater is the need that this doctrine of love be instilled into their minds, that it may become a controlling influence in their lives? "For he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?"

An instance of a few days ago confirms this thought. My husband had received an urgent summons to attend a missionary, critically ill at a station some 200 miles distant. Making hasty preparations, he was off on the 20-mile walk to the nearest railway station.

When he had started, and the hustle of helping him to make ready was over, some of our people were asking what it meant. "Where was the master going, and why so hurried?"

I explained his errand, and told them that among white people a doctor would respond to a call and go a long distance to try to save one life.

One boy, with an understanding nod of the head, said, "Yes, I have seen that the white people here love one another very much. We black people are not like you. We see sick people come here, and you care for them many days, people whom you have not known before; but, if our friends come to visit us, when they have eaten three times, then we ask them why they are staying and eating our food. Yes, the white people certainly do love one another."

And I was so happy to be able to tell them that it is the love of God in our hearts that reaches out to our fellowmen—not only to those of our own race, but it is the love of God and His Son that brings us here to teach those who know so little of any love.

Dear Friends, we do so earnestly desire for those who "sit in darkness" that they may see "a great light"—a revelation of love Divine. Some of them desire to know the Way of Life—but more are indifferent. For these we pray that they may be blessed with deep conviction and interest in their own salvation.

May your brotherly love lead you to intercede in behalf of these dark brothers of another continent, "for the love of Christ constraineth us."

Sincerely yours,

VIRGINIA L. BLACKBURN.

Correspondence.

HARRISBURG, PA., Feb. 15, 1907.

My Dear Brother Editor:

There have been enough developments in the Legislature thus far to make it extremely hopeful that a local option bill in some form can be passed at this session, provided the people and the press keep up the pressure for the next three or four weeks. We may not be able to get it in the exact form that we would like, but I feel that ought not to be insisted upon too strongly. We are after the principle of local option by which the people may decide the liquor question for themselves in a given territory. With that once introduced into our Pennsylvania laws there can be rapid progress on the question in the future.

It will be well for all of the friends of local option, also, to write urgent letters to the chairmen of the Law and Order Committees, Senator W. C. Miller and George Schad. These letters at present, especially, should go to George Schad, as the bill is in his committee.

We must have local option at this session in some form, and a united and persistent effort will accomplish it, in all probability.

Very cordially,

S. E. NICHOLSON,

State Supt. Pa. Anti-Saloon League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

We enclose a statement which is made unanimously by students and teachers of the Friends' Bible Institute:

STATEMENT OF FRIENDS' BIBLE INSTITUTE, CLEVELAND, OHIO.
Because of the many sensational reports in the daily newspapers, which have been copied throughout the country, and even in religious papers, we feel it due the general public to make the following statement:

Our school had been definitely praying during the fall term for an outpouring of the Spirit. During the first week of January, the week of prayer, two ministers of another denomination came to us with the teaching that the real baptism with the Holy Ghost was an endowment of power upon the previously sanctified life, and that it was witnessed to by speaking in tongues as on the day of Pentecost. Many hearts which were earnestly seeking the Lord in greater fulness were more or less influenced by the teaching, though many saw the fallacy of it. We believe some things took place which were not of God.

During the weeks of earnest prayer following the meetings, the conclusion has been very generally reached that this teaching is a mistaken one. We greatly deplore the existence of a movement for the spread of this doctrine.

We believe that it rests with God to bestow the gift of tongues as any other gift upon whom He will, but that when conferred it should be given the position assigned to it in Scripture.

Our confidence is not placed in gifts, manifestations, nor illuminations, but in the precious blood of Christ and the work of the Holy Ghost, in the regeneration of sinners and the complete sanctification of believers through the filling or baptism with the Spirit.

Signed on behalf of faculty and entire school,

J. WALTER MALONE,

EMMA B. MALONE,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I would be very much obliged if thee would give this article publication:

GREAT NATIONAL ISSUES.

"Is not this the fast that I have chosen (saith the Lord), to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke."

God, in His wisdom and providence, has raised up men and women in all ages to take advanced ground on great moral questions and national issues, to grapple with the problems of the age in which they lived, "to break the bands of wickedness, and to let the oppressed go free," not heeding the praise or blame of men, but pressing forward unto great achievements and glorious victories.

Such was the case in the anti-slavery movement in the United States through which some of us elderly people have passed, and helped to bear the burden and heat of the day, regardless of the persecution and ridicule of the scoffer.

The public sentiment against the extension of the slave trade and slavery grew until some more practical measure was required, in addition to moral means, public speaking and the press.

Those stanch reformers of the times organized the Abolition party in order to meet the exigencies of the case more successfully. And many years later they organized the Republican party, and the people rallied to their standard to check the bounds of slavery and the slave territory in this country.

History is now repeating itself in respect to the problems of our times, especially in relation to the prohibition movement of the day, the greatest and most important issue that has ever come before the American people, not merely in the way of reform, but that also of financial and political economy, as this Government stands upon the home, and is dependent upon it for its life, strength and national greatness. Therefore, all laudable means should be used to do away with this legalized traffic, and the saloons of our country, and protect and save the home and rising generation (including myriads of helpless and defenseless children) from the appalling consequences of intoxicating liquors, the greatest enemy to Christian civilization and the public good, that has ever been inaugurated in the world's history. This business and habit of drink permeates all our interests, business and politics, the home, church and State, and every profession and branch of society.

Now, if we would abolish the liquor traffic, it would relieve us of this great burden, lessen pauperism and crime 80 per cent., and give protection to our homes and industries, with an uplift to society that would open the way for other reforms and prove a great blessing to the church and country at large.

The temperance reformers who had carried on this work for so many years, through moral and religious means, public speaking and the press, saw that it was not equal to the emergency of the case to grapple with the liquor traffic, in its organized power and moneyed interest. Therefore, through force of circumstances beyond their control, were under just as much necessity and obligation to our country, to organize the Prohibition party to meet the urgent demand of our times in arresting the progress and devastation of the liquor traffic and saloon influence on society, with the purpose to overthrow and abolish it, as it was for the Republican party to have been organized to meet the demands of its time in arresting the encroachments of slavery and the slave trade in this country, and to let the oppressed go free.

In view of the emphatic Scripture teaching, with its denunciations, warnings and reproof to those who handle or use strong drink, the enormity of the liquor traffic, as the fountain of iniquity, that is burdening the country with so much suffering, pauperism and crime, should inspire the lovers of humanity to rally to the standard of prohibition, as it is now coming to our relief with promise and success, inasmuch as it has elected twelve leading prohibitionists to the Legislatures in eight of our States, beside filling many other important offices.

In consideration of those facts, with the awakened public conscience on the subject, it is evident that we are approaching a great and important crisis, when prohibition will become the dominant issue, and will command the attention of the nation as never before, and some party will carry this noble cause to victory, and change the attitude of our Government in its relations to this gigantic iniquity and national evil, that is destroying the young manhood of our country, and filling our prisons and charitable institutions with the victims of drink and of ruin.

And many will regret, after it is too late, that they did not lend a helping hand to this great reform for civic righteousness and prohibition.

DAVID TATUM.

Chicago, Ill.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

David Tatum, Chicago, is now in the South delivering temperance lectures.

E. Worth Coulson, member of Scott's Mills, Oregon, has been visiting Friends in Kansas and Iowa.

Alfred Ware remained at Friends' University after the close of the recent Biblical Conference, and held a series of meetings.

Stella Hammond, pastor in the meeting at Barclay, Kan., was in attendance at the Bible Conference, held recently at Wichita.

A letter from Joseph W. Parker, Coffeyville, Kan., reveals his keen interest in Friends and their activities, though he is isolated from any meeting:

Josiah Butler, Barclay, Kan., late yearly meeting superintendent of Kansas Yearly Meeting, is soon to take charge of Pleasant Plains Meeting, in Haviland Quarter, as pastor.

Philander Hinshaw, Haviland, who is doing pastoral work in the meeting, near Cunningham, Kan., held a series of meetings recently in the meeting, assisted by other Friends from Haviland.

Quite a number of Friends are settling in and about Fowler, Kan. The Academy now enrolls 25 students, and a number of school teachers will take work during the spring term. Prof. Henry Townsend is in charge.

W. V. Culver, of University Monthly Meeting, Wichita, a member of Kansas Yearly Meeting Temperance Committee, is now in the limits of Haviland Quarterly Meeting, lecturing. In Twelfth-month he visited meetings in Walnut Creek, Pleasant View, Springdale, and Hesper Quarters, and First-month, in Stella Quarter.

A three weeks' meeting has just been held at Ludlow Falls, Ohio, conducted by Arthur Wollam, and the pastor, Hiram Wollam. There was good interest and spiritual life manifested. The Christians are greatly strengthened. There were several renewals, 10 conversions, and 11 presented their names for membership.

A Friend in Chicago, says in a letter, that "steps were taken yesterday [the 10th inst] at Hull House, to reorganize the Chicago Peace Society, and to place it on a firm financial foundation. Edwin D. Mead and his estimable wife, from Boston, addressed the meeting, which proved to be an enthusiastic one. The chair, Jenkin Loyd Jones, appointed a strong committee, which is to consider ways and means and report to a future meeting, when permanent officers will be elected."

John Watson, the well-known Scotch author and preacher, "Ian MacLaren," is delivering a series of three lectures at Haverford College, Pa., on the "Church in Scotland in the Eighteenth Century." His first lecture was delivered the evening of the 14th inst.; the second the 19th inst., and the third will come the 26th. John Watson is accompanied on this visit to America by his wife. After the lecture on the 14th, a reception was held, and opportunity given for the faculty, students and friends to meet John Watson and wife.

The lectures of Rufus M. Jones, delivered at Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, under the supervision of the Educational Committee of the Five Years' Meeting, were well received. A Friend writes, "They were well attended, locally, and a few came from adjacent quarterly meetings. They were able and impressive, and were highly appreciated, particularly by the professors and the students of the college, and by a number of the citizens and a few city pastors. They will mark an epoch in the thinking of many young men and women."

The Friends in Jamestown, Ohio, have just closed a successful series of meetings, extending over a period of four weeks, without intermission. The pastor, C. W. Moorman, had charge of all the services, except four, when resident ministers of the village assisted. The attendance was above the average, as was also the attention and good behavior which prevailed during the service. The net result of the work is seventeen conversions, twelve renewals and twenty-one accessions. The meeting is now in a better condition to do aggressive work than for years past.

At Farmington Quarterly Meeting, held in Collins, N. Y., Friends were favored with the acceptable and instructive services of L. Hollingsworth Wood, who addressed an evening meeting upon "Early Friends," and also took part in the meetings for worship, and in the business sessions with helpful and encouraging messages. J. Lindley Spicer was in attendance with timely assistance. He gave a Biblical talk upon the International Lessons for this Quarter.

On Fifth-day evening Anna Sands Leggett conducted an evangelistic meeting.

The quarterly meeting was well attended. All seemed benefited by the social part of the quarterly meeting.

During the quarterly meeting time, interested Friends called upon our dear friends, John and Sarah Wetherald. The hearty welcome and the cheerful life of these dear friends, who are so often "shut in," is an example to Christians.

Acting on behalf of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia, Richard Wood called at the White House recently, and presented the President a memorial of that body, respectfully urging upon him the importance of including in his instructions to the commissioners to The Hague Conference certain features regarded as important by the Association.

These contemplate the signing of a treaty making arbitration of all international controversies obligatory; provision for periodic sessions of the conference, thereby establishing a permanent international body whereby a recognized and authoritative code of international law may be developed, the exertion of the influence of this Government to arrest the increase of armaments and ultimately to insure their proportionate reduction, and the absolute neutrality of all private commerce in time of war.

President Roosevelt promised to bring the memorial to the attention of Secretary Root.

Hon. Albert F. N. Hambleton, who is in his second term in the Iowa Legislature, is the only Iowa Friend now in a State office. There are few more influential members in the House. He is Speaker pro tempore throughout this term of the Legislature, and makes a good presiding officer. He is chairman of the important Committee on Mines and Mining, and is a member of other important committees. He has introduced the so-called Anti-tipping Bill, which, however, strikes more effectively at all sorts of graft in commercial transactions, and after which, it is said, the Missouri Legislature has modeled its new anti-tipping law. He has also introduced into the Legislature a bill for an amendment to the Constitution, giving women the right to vote at all elections in the State. At present they may vote only in school elections. But Albert Hambleton at no time forgets his part in the interests and active duties of the church. Such Friends need our encouragement and sympathy.

Chicago Quarterly Meeting was held the 2nd inst. Murray S. Kenworthy, minister at Kokomo, Ind., now a professor at Earlham College, was in attendance. Also Prof. Albertson, superintendent of Sabbath-school work in Western Yearly Meeting. The committee appointed to visit and report on the request of Western Springs Monthly Meeting to be discontinued, reported that, in their judgment, the request should be granted, and the meeting was discontinued. The committee, also appointed to visit the West Side congregation, Chicago, in regard to their request to be organized as a monthly meeting, reported in favor of granting the request, and directed the first meeting to be held on the first Fourth-day of this month, which was done. It seemed to be a rather strange condition of church affairs, that a meeting of 50 members and a good house should be discontinued, and a congregation of 30 members, and no house, should be organized; but the circumstances in each case seemed to demand this proceeding.

An Earlham College banquet was held the 2nd inst. in the Young Men's Christian Association rooms, Chicago. It was a pleasant gathering of graduates, pupils and friends of Earlham College, to the number of 58. Robert L. Kelly, president of Earlham College, was in attendance by invitation, and gave a very encouraging and forceful account of the condition of the college. A letter also was read from Joseph G. Cannon, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and one from Thomas Charles, both of whom were unable to attend, which gave a number of interesting reminiscences of their school life at Indiana Boarding School, now Earlham College. Also, an interesting account was given by Charles F. Coffin of the early history of Indiana Boarding School. He is probably the only person now living who could give so good a history of the efforts put forth by early Friends, in 1840 and 1841, to raise money to start the school. A number of other speeches were made by persons connected more or less with the college, and the occasion was very entertaining and very encouraging to all persons interested in Earlham College. The holding of these gatherings had been discontinued for a few years in Chicago, but all who attended expressed their anxiety to have them continued after this.

The Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia are sending the following letter to the clergy of the country:

"DEAR FRIEND:

"As fellow-workers for the good of humanity and the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ, the Prince of Peace, we earnestly ask you to consider what the attitude of the Church should be toward the proposed naval and military program of the Jamestown Exposition.

"The management has advertised the greatest naval and military display in the world's history, and proposes a program which appeals to the lower instincts of our people, and tends to influence the passion for militarism from which our country has so far been enviably free. The program includes: 'A magnificent pyrotechnic production of war scenes, 'the greatest array of gorgeous military uniforms of all nations ever seen in any country,' 'the grandest military and naval demonstration ever attempted in any age by any nation,' and 'a great living picture of war with all its enticing splendors.'

"All this presents war as a thing of splendor, a pageant and a game, while in reality it is a horror and a crime against civilization and humanity. A national exposition should be a great educational influence. This program exalts the war spirit as the most effective agent in the progress of our country, and perverts the lessons taught by history.

"The historic attitude of our branch of the Church toward all war as contrary to the spirit of human brotherhood taught by Christ is well known. We are not so narrow as to expect all our fellow-Christians to adopt our point of view, but in this instance we feel it our duty to appeal to you to use your influence toward lessening this danger to the highest religious and moral life of our people.

"It may be too late to change the most prominent features of the Jamestown program, but it is not too late to modify the more objectionable elements, and to educate public sentiment to estimate the naval and military side of the Exposition at its true value.

"To this end, we urge you to appeal to the sentiment of your Church, first: to petition the President and Board of Governors of the Jamestown Exposition Co., Norfolk, Va., to change the emphasis in their plans, and thus redeem this great Exposition from the stigma of ministering to the vanities and passions, rather than to the ideals of our nation; and, secondly, to enlighten and rouse the public conscience upon this question, so that those who visit the Exposition, or learn of it through the press, may look upon it from a Christian point of view, and so be strengthened to resist the insidious appeal made to false patriotism.

"May all who work and pray for the coming of the Kingdom of God on the earth be united in this cause.

"Signed on behalf and by authority of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia.

FOOD QUESTION.

SETTLED WITH PERFECT SATISFACTION BY

It's not an easy matter to satisfy all the members of the family at meal time, as every housewife knows.

And when the husband has dyspepsia and can't eat the simplest ordinary food without causing trouble, the food question becomes doubly annoying.

An Illinois woman writes:

"My husband's health was poor, he had no appetite for anything I could get for him, it seemed.

"He was hardly able to work, was taking medicine continually, and as soon as he would feel better would go to work again only to give up in a few weeks. He suffered severely with stomach trouble.

"Tired of everything I had been able to get for him to eat, one day seeing an advertisement about Grape-Nuts, I got some for him to try for breakfast the next morning.

"We all thought it was pretty good, although we had no idea of using it regularly. But when my husband came home at night he asked for Grape-Nuts.

"It was the same next day, and I had to get it right along, because when we would get to the table the question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?' was a regular thing. So I began to buy it by the dozen packages.

"My husband's health began to improve right along. I sometimes felt offended when I'd make something I thought he would like for a change, and still hear the same old question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?'

"He got so well that for the last two years he has hardly lost a day from his work, and we are still using Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

the statute permitting the licensing of gambling in that State.

Two vessels collided off the coast of Rhode Island one day last week, and one hundred and fifty lives were lost.

A National Peace Congress will be held in Carnegie Hall, New York City, opening the 14th of Fourth month. The occasion promises to be the greatest national demonstration in behalf of international arbitration and peace which the country has ever seen. Two national arbitration congresses have already been held. Both of them in Washington. The first in 1896 and the second in 1904.

So successful were the efforts of the Bureau of Information and Statistics of the New York State Department of Agriculture in securing laborers for the farmers of the State last year, that it is putting into effect this year the same plans on a much larger scale. It is estimated that 50,000 laborers will be required this spring. To supply this great demand the bureau has advertised extensively in New York and Europe. Many applications have been received from Holland and other European countries, where whole families are willing to emigrate if assured of farm employment. During last year the bureau furnished 4,171 laborers.

Judge Artman, Lebanon, Ind., has just handed down a decision on the right of States to grant a saloon license, which, if sustained by the Supreme Court, will open the way for the most effective fight yet waged against the liquor business. Judge Artman held that a State has no right to grant a saloon license, since the granting of such license means that the State can sell and delegate the right to make widows and orphans, the right to break up homes, the right to create misery and crime, the right to make murderers, the right to produce idiots and lunatics, the right to produce orphanages, poor-houses, insane asylums, jails and penitentiaries and the right to furnish subjects for the hangman's gallows. The case will be carried to the State Supreme Court.

Secretary Straus, who has just been appointed to the portfolio of Commerce and Labor, has rendered a decision that will be far reaching in its effects, especially in the Southern States. The question at issue was whether States or Territories might offer inducements for immigrants through advertising in foreign countries without violating the contract labor laws of the United States. The secretary has decided that it is not a violation of the law and the South, so long in need of laborers, will have a free hand to press their claims in European countries. Of the more than 1,000,000 aliens who landed on our shores last year, only about 4 per cent. of them found their way south of the Mason & Dixon line.

out from the central office, we learn that all the denominational missionary boards have given the movement their most cordial endorsement. The first important undertaking of the movement is to organize a commission of from 50 to 100 laymen, to visit the mission fields at their own expense, and report the results of their investigation to the church at home. The Executive Committee has already discovered about 30 men who hope to go, although no special effort to secure commissioners has yet been made. The investigation of the commission will be continued throughout this year, the final report being made early in 1908. Three commissioners have already sailed. Others follow soon.

The Advocate of Peace for Second month opens with a discussion on "International Relief." After reviewing the probable mental condition of Governor Swettenham, which induced him to send the American marines from Kingston at an hour when the city was in sore distress, the editor concludes, "If the offer of aid had come in non-war vessels, it is hardly likely that even a man of Swettenham's character would have conjured up reasons for not accepting it. Warships are not naturally looked upon as angels of mercy. While they exist, there is certainly no better use to which they can be put. But nations at their present stage of enlightenment ought both to get along with fewer warships than they now have, and they ought to organize and maintain a system of international relief by sea which would never stand the least chance of being misinterpreted. Why cannot the powers which have organized the Red Cross, whose neutral work of mercy is always and everywhere welcomed and trusted, organize a small, international fleet of non-warship relief vessels, which at small expense, compared with the enormous cost of warships, could be built and kept distributed at various strategic points about the seas, ready at call to bear relief to any coast cities visited by calamities making extraneous help at once imperative?"

DREADED TO EAT.

A QUAKER COUPLE'S EXPERIENCE.

How many persons dread to eat their meals, although actually hungry nearly all the time!

Nature never intended this should be so, for we are given a thing called appetite that should guide us as to what the system needs at any time and can digest.

But we get in a hurry, swallow our food very much as we shovel coal into the furnace, and our sense of appetite becomes unnatural and perverted. Then we eat the wrong kind of food or eat too much, and there you are—indigestion and its accompanying miseries.

A Philadelphia lady said, the other day:

"My husband and I have been sick and nervous for fifteen or twenty years from drinking coffee—feverish, indigestion, totally unfit, a good part of the time, for work or pleasure. We actually dreaded to eat our meals.

"We tried doctors and patent medicines that counted up into hundreds of dollars, with little, if any, benefit.

"Accidentally, a small package of Postum came into my hands. I made some according to directions, with surprising results. We both liked it and have not used any coffee since.

"The dull feeling after meals has left us and we feel better every way. We are so well satisfied with Postum that we recommend it to our friends who have been made sick and nervous and miserable by coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. FAITH.

The pilgrim's pathway often leads Into the shadows dim;
'Tis then that doubts and fears assail
And hover over him.

With downcast eyes he plods along,
And mourns his helpless plight,
While clouds obscure the Sun of Hope
And leave him in the night.

But when the Master sees his need,
And hears his plaintive cry,
He stoops to help the weary one
From His great throne on high.

The still, small voice within his breast Speaks to the traveler:
"Lift up thine eyes unto the hills,
The sun is shining there."

By faith he lifts his weary eyes,
Lo, all is light above!
And up the mountain leads his path
Made bright by God's great love.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

Second month 27, is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and it is well to feel again the heart throbs of this loved American poet in a few lines from his pen:

Truly we do but grope here in the dark,
Near the partition-wall of Life and Death,
At every moment dreading or desiring
To lay our hands upon the unseen door!
Let us, then, labor for an inward stillness,—
An inward stillness and an inward healing;
That perfect silence where the lips and heart
Are still, and we no longer entertain
Our own imperfect thoughts and vain opinions,
But God alone speaks in us, and we wait
In singleness of heart, that we may know
His will, and in the silence of our spirits,
That we may do His will, and do that only!

* * * *

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
And leave his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,
Nor wholly reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
So Nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings one by one, and by the hand
Leads us to rest so gently that we go
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know.

* * * *

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need for arsenals nor forts.
The warrior's name would be a name abhorred,
And every nation that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Should wear forever more the curse of Cain.

THE SCRIPTURES.

Those who persistently assert that the Friends who sympathize with "the modern movement" undervalue the Scriptures, would be just as near the truth if they asserted that all such Friends are horse-thieves. Such assertions are wholly false and stand on nothing but the erroneous views of those who make them. There is surely something the trouble with the Christianity of a man who expects to forward the Kingdom of God by fabricating and circulating such statements. It is only one step removed from the spirit that burned men at the stake in order to protect a system of dogmatic religion.

We believe to the depth of our souls that the Bible is a revelation of God, and was given forth by Divine inspiration through holy men who spake as they were moved. We believe everything the Bible claims for itself about its origin, and even more. It is a voice of the Spirit to the race, a word of God, quick and powerful, which searches our thoughts and hearts and finds us where we live. The world, with the Bible gone out of it, would be inconceivably poor, and a Christian who undervalued it would be as blind and stupid as the man who undervalued the sunlight.

These critics who make these false assertions have missed the whole meaning of the movement which confronts them. What has come is a higher valuation of Scripture, not a lower. We have raised, not lowered, the estimation of the Bible. No men have ever lived who have studied the Bible with such devotion, such painstaking care, such honesty of mind as the Christian scholars who are leading us to-day into the fuller light.

He really undervalues the Bible who makes a traditional book of it, who wraps it up in a medieval napkin, who resorts to far-fetched allegories to get over hard passages, and who uses casuistry and jugglery in dealing with the difficulties of text and matter. No less does that Christian undervalue it who blindly reads it all his life without taking any pains to discover the real spirit and meaning of it.

The modern method of Bible study has gained its place in the church, because the old method discredits the Bible, undervalues it and belittles it. The modern method is nothing but a serious, persistent effort to understand the Bible. Serious men discovered that the book of Galatians, for instance, could not be understood or appreciated until we could get the setting of the epistle. Who were the Galatians? What had been happening in Galatia which occasioned the epistle? What is the real issue of the epistle? At what state in Paul's life does it come? These are some of the things we must know if we would penetrate the mighty message of it. Now, who undervalues the Bible, the man who reads it in ignorance, or the man who comes to it with his eyes open to the facts which help interpret its true meaning? There is but one answer. The old method of treating the book of Jonah focussed the attention on the marvelous story in the book. It is responsible for the Robert Ingersoll attitude, and for the fact that all over the world the name, "Jonah," provokes a smile. Under the new method of study, the book of Jonah has become one of the most wonderful messages in the Scripture canon. It is now seen to be, with the book of Hosea, the sublimest revelation of the universal love of God before the coming of Christ. Who, we ask, has undervalued the book? There is but one answer.

Higher criticism is nothing but a method of study—not a set of opinions, or of conclusions. It has in a thousand ways proved its value. It has increased our faith, our reverence, our insight, our worship. It is a method which has given us a living Bible, throbbing with reality, and it has brought us face to face with that one Person who is the Word of God.

R. M. J.

THE ABRAHAM LESSON.

Those of us who are following the International Lessons, are now interested in Abraham, and, while the story of his life is fresh in our minds, it may be timely to ask the secret of his success. What are the qualities which make him stand out in history and give him a prominent place in sacred literature? True, he was the father of many nations; he was rich in herds and servants, and he was successful in a military campaign, but, in spite of all these things, he would have been forgotten ages ago if he had not possessed other virtues; in fact, we almost forget them while reading the story. In the first place, Abraham had the happy faculty of being dissatisfied—that blessed, divine dissatisfaction which makes men long for eternal and abiding things. His career began with a migration, and he was a sojourner and a seeker all his life. To put it in other words, he was a man with ideals. No matter what his circumstances in life, his outlook was always bright. A golden age lay before him, and every road led to it. What a contrast to those who follow the beaten paths, living with their faces to the ground, and with little or no ambition to rise. To them, life becomes a burden, labor a drudgery, religion a cruel fate, and death a release. Not so with Abraham; life is an opportunity, God is his friend, and all the future is full of hope.

We find these two classes all about us. There are those who are crushed by reverses—beaten down by trials and temptations, because their vision is short. They live narrow, sordid lives, seeing only the momentary advantage and finding constant disappointment in the vanishing baubles which allure them. On the other hand, there are many who welcome difficulties with a strong heart, because they live in hope. They reach beyond their momentary selves and trust. They are full of visions and plans and prospects.

Happy, blessed faculty this hungering, this thirsting, this ever restless energy that drives us out. Abraham had it, but with him it was only a beginning—only the shadow of things to come. He saw a future full of promise, but it had a price, and this price he was willing to pay. He must leave his country and his kindred—all that was dear to his childhood and youth, and sojourn among strangers. Even his child—the one given to comfort him in the evening of life—was bound by his own hands for sacrifice. All this was done in obedience to the voice that ever called him onward and upward. Yes, he was always ready to pay the price, and this is the quality that makes him the father of the faithful.

Here is the secret of his success, and it is the secret of all success. It is the key which opens the way to life or leaves us in the way of death. It is not enough to catch a higher vision and hear a call to better things. We must pay the price. Saving faith is more than a vision of things hoped for, because it costs something; in fact, it costs everything, and we must ever be willing to endure and endeavor, if we are to become true children of Abraham.

FRIENDS' VIEWS OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES AS SET FORTH BY ROBERT BARCLAY.

BY WM. H. FUTRELL.

Robert Barclay joined the Society of Friends in 1667. He was a young man, being then nineteen years old, possessed of great energy and endowed with talents of a very high order. His ancestry, early training, education and environment prepared him for great responsibilities and for successful leadership. But, in addition to these qualifications, this young man was fired with a religious zeal. He had experienced the new birth, and was a living example of the transforming influence of the Holy Spirit. He became a minister of the Gospel.

The Society at this time, in England, probably numbered 25,000. It was exerting a tremendous influence. Its beliefs and practices were unique, but, as the Friends issued no formal creed, their doctrines were subject to criticism and misunderstanding. George Fox had felt it necessary to set forth some of the doctrines of the Society in a paper which he drew up in 1671, and which he presented to the Governor of Barbadoes while on a visit there.

This document clearly showed, among other things, that the charges made against the Society of denying the divine inspiration of the Scriptures were false and utterly unfounded.

Robert Barclay, about a year before this, viz., in 1670, had also defended the principles of Friends by a treatise, entitled "Truth Cleared of Calumnies." When he published his "Catechism and Confession of Faith," etc. His Apology, however, was his principal work. This was published in 1678—eleven years after he joined the Society. It was written and published in Latin, and subsequently translated by Barclay into English.

That portion of his Apology which he devotes to the Friends' views of the Holy Scriptures is a complete defense to the attacks and criticism made against the Society. One reason why the Friends were thought by some to put rather a low estimate on the Bible, was because they did not speak of it as the Word of God. That title, the Friends held, and still hold, was given to Christ, Himself (John 1:14). They, however, regarded it as the words of God. Barclay states that the Scriptures contain (1) an historical account of the actings of God's people in various ages; (2) a prophetic account of several things; (3) a full and ample account of all the chief principles of the teachings of Christ. He also shows that the Society of Friends really had a very high regard for the Holy Scriptures. They are subordinate, however, to the Holy Spirit. They are a secondary rule. They are a declaration of the fountain, but not the fountain itself. And it is only the spiritual man who can make the right use of them. They are able to make the man of God perfect.

William Penn wrote, "No society of professing Christians could have a more reverent and honorable esteem for the Scriptures." Barclay endorses this statement, and also agrees with Fox, who had already written, "We believe that the Holy Scriptures were given forth by the Holy Spirit of God, through the holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," etc. That "they are able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus." Barclay also adds, "The great work of the Scriptures, and their service to us is, that we may witness them fulfilled in us, and so discern the stamp of God's spirit upon them, by the inward acquaintance we have with the same Spirit and work in our hearts."

The early Friends were men and women of prayer, and they diligently searched the Holy Scriptures, and exhorted one another to read them. It is but natural, therefore, that they should have believed that the Holy Scriptures were given forth by the Holy Spirit of God, through the holy men of God who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter 1, 21). Friends, according to Barclay, held that the same Spirit who had inspired the authors of the Scriptures abode yet in the hearts of those who read, to interpret and apply its precepts. This spirit was to be relied on for more than an intellectual knowledge of the letter of the Scriptures. And he further states: "God is teacher of His people Himself; and there is nothing more express, than that such as are under the new covenant, need no man to teach them."

This view shows the difference between the Puritan and the Friend, and is illustrated by John S. Rowntree in his book, entitled "The Society of Friends, Its Faith and Practice," thus: "Because Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord, the Puritan deemed that he should do likewise; the Friend interpreted the incident in the light of the progressive revelation of the Divine will, and the example of the Savior, who 'came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them.'"

This experimental knowledge of Christ, therefore, as advocated by Friends, was the true antidote to unbelief. It could withstand the attacks upon, or attempt to undermine, the authority of the Holy Scriptures. The Friend held that he should not dwell with his doubts, but with his convictions. That he should prove the truth for himself—testing it not so much by arguing as by acting upon it, and submitting himself to God. This accounts for a very familiar expression among Friends which we hear to this day, viz.: "Individual faithfulness." Westcott, in his "Social Aspects of Christianity," says: "The Quakers express with the greatest force and exclusiveness the thought of the Reformation, the thought of individuality."

The Friends' conception of the Holy Scriptures, therefore, as set forth by Barclay, was so much more spiritual than that of other professing Christians, one can clearly understand why the Friends could not continue in fellowship with them. The Friends exhorted one another to familiarize themselves with the contents of the Scriptures, but, above all, to live in close touch with, and under the direct influence of, the Divine Spirit which inspired them. A simple doctrine, indeed, and yet one which too few of us actually experience.

THE INTERPRETATION AND USE OF THE BIBLE.

BY ELBERT RUSSELL.

XIV. Principles of Literary Criticism.

Literary criticism makes use of language, style and literary form, and the literary methods of the Hebrew and Hellenistic writers, to aid in determining such matters as the authorship, sources, date, and purpose of the Biblical writings. Let us take first the matter of language. The Hebrew language underwent a marked development. As time passed, old words fell out of use, and new words came in; words changed meaning and the syntax varied. Through a thousand years, these changes can be traced by means of works about the dates of which there is general agreement. The Hebrew of Zechariah 1-8, Malachi, Ezra and Nehemiah, differs in many and striking points from the earliest narratives in Judges and Samuel. Every student of English literature knows how the English of Shakespeare differs from that of Kipling, and how in turn the language of Chaucer differs from that of Shakespeare. The language of Ecclesiastes is as different from that of Solomon's time as that of Chaucer differs from Tennyson. Judged by such standards, Jonah, Joel, Daniel, Esther, Ecclesiastes, and many of the Psalms are among the latest books of the Old Testament. Such considerations raise at once the question: How did such a book as Ecclesiastes get attributed to Solomon, and Daniel to a prophet of the exile? The answer to this must come from a knowledge of the Hebrew notions of authorship and the grounds on which they attached names of men to their books.

The titles to the books of the Bible were, as a rule, not put there by the writers, but by the scribes, whose business it was to copy and teach them. They did not so much attempt to describe the contents of a book in its title as to give it a convenient name, by which to refer to it. Thus the scribes called the first book of the Old Testament by the first word in it, "B'reshith," (In the beginning). The other books of the Pentateuch are likewise named from their first words, except that Numbers was called by its fifth word. It was only when these books were translated into Greek that the translators tried, by giving them their present titles, to describe their contents: Genesis, from the frequent genealogies; Exodus, because the first part is concerned with the exodus from Egypt; Leviticus, because occupied with the ritual laws for Levites; Numbers, from the numbering of the people described in its first part; Deuteronomy, from the Greek rendering of 17: 18, in which "copy of this law" was translated as "this second giving of the law" (deuteronomion). The Pentateuch, as a whole, was named from its most characteristic contents, "The Law of Moses" or more briefly, "The Law," or after its most prominent character, simply "Moses." The narrative books of the Old Testament are usually named for their most prominent heroes. The books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings, are named, not for their authors, but for the persons who occupy the first place in them. The books of I and II Samuel were originally one book, divided into two parts, because, if written on a single roll, it would be unwieldy. That Samuel was not the author of the book, is seen from the fact that he died in the midst of the events recorded in it. Likewise, the names, Jonah, Job, Ruth, Esther, Song of Solomon, describe, not the authors, but the heroes of these books. In case of the prophets, some of the Psalms, Proverbs, etc., however, the name in the title usually designates the supposed author, though "Malachi" (literally "my messenger" or "my angel") is probably a designation taken from 3: 1 for an anonymous prophecy.

In the New Testament, the names attached to the Gospels indicate reputed authorship; the "Acts of Apostles" are not acts which apostles wrote, but acts which they performed. The titles to the Epistles give, as a rule, the name of the writer, and of church or person to whom addressed. In case of Hebrews, only the destination is given, and in the case of John, Peter, Jude, and the Revelation of John, the reputed author is named. But even in the comparatively few cases where the name of a book was intended by the scribes to indicate the author, we cannot attach our strict notions of original and unchanged composition to the idea of "authorship."

Among the Hebrews, the idea of authorship is first of all influenced by the fact of oral transmission. Solomon did not write proverbs, but "spoke" them (1 Kgs., 4: 32, 33). They were remembered and retold among the people until someone made a collection of proverbs, reputed to be Solomon's. Such is found in Prov. 10: 1; 24: 22. Later, the "men of Hezekiah" wrote down another collection, which was also embodied in the book of Proverbs (25: 1; 29: 27.). It is not to be thought that anyone could be sure in Hezekiah's day that all these couplets were uttered by Solomon in just the form they were found. The people who treasured them, and then passed them on, may have made changes, here and there, for better or worse. The collectors gathered up what they found of the Solomonic type. The introductory verses (1: 1-6), which constitute the title to the Book of Proverbs, certainly do not mean more than that large sections of the book contain proverbs ascribed to Solomon (10: 1; 24: 22; 25: 1; 29: 27). Chapters 1-9 are hardly Solomon's; 24: 23-24 is a collection of sayings of other wise men; chap. 30 is ascribed to Agur, and chap. 31 to Lemuel.

The songs of Israel, like the earliest proverbs, were at first oral and preserved by memory. Such a psalm might serve many purposes and be changed to meet new needs. For example, Psalm 24 seems to have been originally composed for the dedication of Jerusalem (see 2 Sam. 6). For that occasion the question "Who shall ascend into the hill of Jehovah" (24: 3), and the challenge to the gates to open for Jehovah of Hosts (24: 7-9), have a special fitness. Psalm 15 shows how part of Psalm 24 (vv. 3-6) was changed ("ascend" to "sojourn"), and expanded to meet the needs of the regular worship. If David were the actual composer of Psalm 24, he might be called in a freer sense the author of Psalm 15. Likewise, in Psalm 51, we see how a psalm of personal penitence was modified by the addition of certain verses (18, 19) to make it an expression of national contrition. (Note the contrast between verses 16 and 19!) To such productions we cannot apply our ideas of authorship. In a popular way the book of Psalms was called the "Book of David," or "Psalms of David." Yet only a fraction of the Psalms were ever ascribed to the "sweet singer of Israel," even in the titles which were put to them by scribes long after they were composed. In the Hebrew, as in the Revised Version, the Psalms are divided into five books. At the end of the second book, a scribe once wrote "The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended." (Ps. 72: 20.).

The beginnings of Hebrew narrative are found in oral stories told from father to son in the tent, and from prophet to people around the sanctuaries at the feasts. References to this process are to be found in Judges 5: 10, 11; 2 Kings 8: 4, 5; Exodus 12: 26, 27; Deut. 26: 5-10. The priestly laws were at first known in detail only to the priests who taught them to their sons when they succeeded them. It was the priest who "taught the people knowledge" of the law (Mal. 2: 7; Hag. 2: 11, 12.), and this law, when later it was written down, was still known as "Thorah" (instruction). The laws relating to conduct were taught by the judges or by the father to son (Deut. 6: 6-9; Ex. 8: 25, 26.). Moses was the founder of the Hebrew nation and its religion, the giver of its first laws. These laws grew according to the expanding and changing life of the Hebrews; and from time to time the laws, as practiced and handed down in family, court and sanctuary, were written down. No one could distinguish, at each stage, the original nucleus which Moses had given from their existing form, so it was all called "law of Moses." The Rabbis in Jesus' time said that even the oral law had been given to Moses at Sinai, and that it had been passed on orally until their own time. And this in spite of the fact that each saying of the oral law had the name of the rabbi attached who first enunciated it.

Cases like this show that the Jews could call a man the author of a work in a sense quite unknown to us, unless it be in the way we call the International Dictionary, Webster's. Solomon had started the tendency to reflection and observation. Succeeding writers felt that they owed to him the example and impulse which led to the production of their own work; that, in a very real sense, he was the author of their writings. Thus we find not only the book of Proverbs, as a whole, and the later Ecclesiastes, but the apocryphal book of Wisdom, written in Greek about 100 B. C., bearing Solomon's name. In a similar sense David was the author of all Israel's hymns. In a similar sense, Moses was the author of the various codes of law in the Pentateuch. In some such way the whole Pentateuch finally came to be called the books of Moses, after their chief hero and "author."

So far did this custom go of naming a work after someone, worthy historically to have written it, that it became a literary custom, as we have already seen, especially in case of apocalyptic writings. Men writing late in Jewish history ascribed their work to Enoch, Baruch, Ezra or Daniel, because they felt historically unworthy to originate prophecy. If we are seeking to know the writers of Biblical books, it becomes evident that we cannot accept the names they bear as settling without further examination, authorship in our modern sense.

Houses, ships, and men are not made for calm hours, sunny seas, and freedom from trial, but to stand storm, tempests, and temptation.

THE RELIGION OF LONGFELLOW.

BY MARY CAROLINE CRAWFORD.

All the New England poets who have spoken with authority and to whose message the world has given a glad ear were men of faith. To see how profoundly Bryant believed in the nearness of the next world one has only to read "Thanatopsis"; Emerson and Whittier were eminently other-worldly, and for even the gay Holmes and the brilliant Lowell the things unseen were very real things. Yet Longfellow was the most religious-minded man of the whole group. Though he came of a race of lawyers, instead of the long line of ministers, to which Emerson, for instance, could point, he was all his life in love with the beauty of holiness, and he never once ceased to feel keen responsibility for the right use of the poetic gift with which God had endowed him.

This spiritual side the poet undoubtedly derived from his mother, Zilpah Wadsworth, who traced her descent to John Alden and Priscilla Mullens of Mayflower memory. Mrs. Longfellow was a lover of church and sermon and hymn, and a devout and constant reader of the Bible, especially of its psalms. Nature in all its aspects, too, seemed to her a manifestation of God. During thunder-storms she loved to sit at the window and observe the splendor of the heavens. The second great commandment was also dear to her; never was there a kinder friend and neighbor than this gentle, sympathetic woman. To her children she was a cherished confidante, and because she herself greatly admired poetry it was a keen pleasure to her to follow the reading and share the enthusiasm of her son Henry. In all American family letters there is nothing more beautiful than those exchanged between these two good comrades while the son was an undergraduate at Bowdoin. Quite sincerely could the youth of twenty-one write from Rome in the midst of his Wanderjahre, "For me a line from my mother is more efficacious than all the homilies preached in Lent; and I find more excitement to virtue in merely looking at your handwriting than in a whole volume of ethics and moral discourses."

But, if Longfellow found little inspiration in volumes of ethics, he found a great deal in the spoken sermon. Though he did not himself care to enter the clerical profession, he records in his diary that Sunday was always less than it should be to him if he had omitted church-going. "I seldom stay at home from church without thinking of that pretty little poem of Goethe, where he says a truant boy was chased over field and through forest by a church-bell." He had an ideal of ministerial labor, too, which it is good for us to know. When only a boy of seventeen he wrote to George W. Wells, in explanation of his decision to be a teacher and literary man instead of a minister:

"The study of divinity I always regard with the greatest reverence; and I should not wish to enter so beautiful a vineyard, however great the harvest and few the laborers, unless I thought that by my care the holy vine would flourish more and its branches yield more fruit. Men, indeed, have thrown a veil of mystery over this beautiful subject, and have made it difficult for the wayfaring man to walk in the light and liberty of religion; and I am confident that human systems have done much to deaden the true spirit of devotion and to render religion merely speculative. Would it not be better for mankind if we should consider it as a cheerful and social companion, given us to go through life with us from childhood to the grave, and to make us happier here as well as hereafter; and not as a stern and chiding taskmaster, to whom we must cling at last through mere despair, because we have nothing else on earth to which we can cling? I conceive that, if religion is ever to benefit us, it must be incorporated with our feelings, and become in every degree identified with our happiness. And hence I love that view of Christianity which sets it in the light of a cheerful, kind-hearted friend, and which gives its thoughts a noble and a liberal turn."

It was expected that the boy thus minded would grow into a man warmly appreciative of earnest preachers and honest preaching. And such proved to be the case. As often as Sunday comes around, one finds in the journal an entry regarding the discourse of that morning, and many of these reveal the poet as a connoisseur in sermons. The one quality essential to a worthy discourse he rightly held to be love for humanity. "To me a sermon is no sermon," he records under date of June 17, 1848, "in which I cannot hear the heart beat." This remark follows an entry on a "hair-splitting sermon."

For cowardice in the pulpit he had only contempt. "A—— preached on conscience this morning," he writes, July 14, 1851. "I could not tell what he was driving at, except that he seemed desirous not to offend the congregation. He seemed to think conscience on the whole a very good thing, but that it was dangerous to act up to it. For my part I maintain that there is no middle course."

When Dickens came to America, Longfellow took him to hear Father Taylor preach, and afterwards he was in the habit of walking into Boston quite frequently on Sunday mornings to listen to that remarkable man. In the journal of January 30, 1853, he writes: "Walked to town with Miss D. to hear Father Taylor. There he was in his little brick 'Bethel,' thundering away to the sailors just as ten years ago when I went to hear him with Dickens. He inclines a little more to 'screeds of doctrine,' and is perhaps less poetical and less nautical than of yore. His sermons give an idea of the field-preaching in the Middle Ages."

Truth to tell, Father Taylor's harangues suited the Longfellow of that time better than did the highly intellectual discourses of Emerson. The first journal entry concerning Emerson is that of March 8, 1838, when Longfellow records attendance at the lecture on the affections. "A good lecture, but he mistakes his power somewhat, and at times speaks in oracles darkly. He is vastly more of a poet than a philosopher. He has a brilliant mind, and develops and expands an idea very beautifully and with abundant similitudes and illustrations." Later the same year there is a reference to "Mr. Emerson" as "a clergyman with new views of life, death, and immortality, author of 'Nature' and friend of Carlyle."

After ten years we find much more enthusiasm over the Concord seer. "Another of Emerson's wonderful lectures to-day [January 29, 1849]. The subject, 'Inspiration'; the lecture itself, an illustration of the theme. Emerson is like a beautiful portico in a lovely scene of nature. We stand expectant waiting for the high priest to come forth; and lo, there comes a gentle wind from the portal, swelling and subsiding; and the blossoms and the vine-leaves shake, and far away down the green fields the grasses bend and wave; and we ask 'When will the high priest come forth and reveal to us the truth?' and the disciples say, 'He has already gone forth, and is yonder in the meadows.' 'And the truth he was to reveal?' 'It is nature, nothing more.'"

Longfellow was so broad that he saw the good in all churches. For instance, he records: "Went to-day to the Episcopal church [Christ Church, Cambridge]. From our gate to the portals of this church the path was better trodden in the old English days of the Vassalls. How the walls rattled and echoed with responses! * * * There is something august in this service, which has been repeated for so many centuries in so many churches. But what a running commentary on this holy liturgy have been the politics of England and the lives of its monarchs!"

Faith without works had no place in Longfellow's scheme of things. Besides being a good son, a devoted husband, an affectionate father, and a faithful friend, he was constantly kind and much more considerate than those who needlessly sought him. He frequently devoted an entire day to sending off autographs which had been begged of him by utter strangers, and no literary aspirant was too unpromising to receive a hearing at his hands, no beggar too revolting to arouse his pity. An entry of 1847 illustrates this last characteristic: "As I was walking on the piazza this morning, an Italian beggar made his appearance with a printed paper. The same old story—inundation in Sicily, etc. I resolved straightway to give him nothing, and after he was gone repented. I have no doubt his story was false; yet, one thing was true—his poverty."

Of the fortitude with which Longfellow bore his own trials, particularly that terrible affliction of his ripe manhood by which a lovely wife suffered the martyrdom of fire under his very eyes, there is no need to speak. His poems tell it all. For it is to be remembered that he was answering his own mood of despondency when he wrote the "Psalm of Life," and so helped thousands then unborn to bear their burdens cheerfully. Yet it is perhaps in the last lines he ever wrote that the beautiful childlike faith of the poet struck its highest note. For he then declared his glorious certainty that

"Out of the shadow of night
The world moves into light;
It is daybreak everywhere."

AUNT SARAH'S TRUST.

The Waltons were having a reunion. Grace, the youngest daughter, and the only one left at home, had arranged it for her mother's sixtieth birthday. The Waltons were a devoted family, and the fact that they had not all been together since Harvey's marriage, ten years before, was due to circumstance, and not to indifference, as was proved by Harvey's bringing his family on from Colorado—a not inexpensive journey for five—and Eleanor's giving up the summer abroad which she had planned.

Every nook and corner of the old house was full. There were Harvey and his wife and three children, Gertrude and the baby from Ohio, Eleanor from Boston, Rodney from Pittsburgh, besides Grace and the parents. The days passed in a round of neighborhood hospitalities, in walks and drives and picnics. One rainy evening, however, the family happened to be alone. Rodney had started a fire in the old fireplace, and Grace brought out cookies and apples, and the old-time setting started old memories.

"Nobody has mentioned Aunt Sarah," Harvey said, suddenly. "Shall you ever forget those visits at her house? Queer, wasn't it, her notion that some time something big would happen in her life, and she'd got to get ready for it by doing every little thing the best way possible? She had a great way of making you feel responsible for yourself. Years after, when I came to a tight place in business—I never told you folks about it—the thought of Aunt Sarah made me brace up, and helped pull me through."

"Same way here," Rodney agreed. "I tried to shirk once or twice, but it was no good. I seemed to see Aunt Sarah at my elbow plain as day. Life was a grind to her if it ever was to anybody, but how she faced it! You remember how she used to rub it in, that you had to be honest in your work for your own sake?"

"I know that Aunt Sarah's theory has helped me in teaching many a time," Eleanor said. "You never know when a human soul may be at some crossroads; you don't DARE shirk."

"Yet," Harvey mused, "nothing ever happened to her, after all—no opportunity. She lived and died in that little hillside farmhouse. She—what's up, Grace? You look as though you had discovered a continent."

"I have!" Grace cried, exultantly. "O boys, how stupid we've all been—how STUPID! Think of the men in your shops, Harvey, and the men Rodney has under him, and the children who pass through Eleanor's classes every year! Think of your own boys, and what you are teaching them, and the people they will influence some day! All of them—every one of them—influenced by the splendid ideals of a little frail woman up on a hill farm; and yet you say no opportunity ever came to her!"

"I believe you have it, Grace," Harvey answered, gravely.—Youth's Companion.

Place.—Isaac, born in Beersheba, passed most of his life in southern Palestine, or "The South."

The story of Isaac, as given in the chapters intervening between the present lesson and the last, or in some Bible dictionary or history, should be read. Isaac is one of the quiet characters of the Bible. There are few incidents of his life recorded, and his whole biography, as given in Genesis, can be summed up in a few paragraphs. He was not a nomad as Abraham was, but, so far as we know, lived a comparatively settled life. He was by no means such a hero as Abraham, but rather an average man. "He impersonates, as it were, the peaceful, obedient, and submissive qualities of an equable trust in God, distinct alike from the transcendent faith of Abraham, and from that lower type which, in Jacob, was learned through discipline and purged from self-will."

12. "Then Isaac sowed in that field." The nomadic life was changing to one partly pastoral, partly agricultural and settled. "Found in the same year an hundred fold." Not an impossible yield on the richest land.

13. "And the man waxed great, and grew more and more until he became very great." R. V. The Lord greatly prospered him.

14. "And he had possessions of flocks, and possessions of herds, and a great household." R. V. "And the Philistines envied him." The Philistines were a people who inhabited southwestern Palestine, along the Mediterranean, and extending quite a distance inland. Their early history and origin are unknown. That they were immigrants seem hardly to admit of question. It is not unlikely that they came from Crete or Cyprus, and, like the Normans in France, adopted the language and customs of their new home. It was natural that they should be jealous of Isaac.

15. The filling up the wells was to show that they regarded them as a trespass on their land, and also to keep Isaac from settling in that territory.

16. "Abimelech." Not the one with whom Abraham was concerned (Gen. 21: 22), but a Philistine king at Gerar. He shows the envy of his people and tells Isaac to leave the country. See Gen. 26: 27.

17. Rather than fight, though he was reasonably sure of victory, Isaac retires. "Valley of Gerar."

Valley; there is no English term exactly corresponding to the original, for such valleys do not exist in England. The Arabic word, "Wady," is an equivalent. This means a watercourse between hills which, dry in summer, may be a torrent in winter, or even after a heavy storm. See verse 19.

18. Re-opened wells dug in the valley years before by Abraham.

19. "Springing water." Running or moving water, and so specially valuable. The Hebrew word means "living." Compare Lev. 14:5; Zech. 14:8; John 4:10, 11; 7:38.

20. Isaac's herdsmen claimed the land, because digging a well, it is said, gave ownership rights. "Esek" means contention.

21. Isaac left the well Esek, and dug another, which he called "Sitnah;" that is Enmity:

22. "He removed from thence." Isaac was determined not to quarrel or to fight, and again retired from what, according to the law of the day, he had a perfect right to keep. "Rehoboth." "Broad places," or "Room." His patience was now rewarded by being let alone. Rehoboth was, if rightly identified, about 25 miles south of Beersheba.

23. Isaac did not remain at Rehoboth, but went on to Beersheba, which was probably his birthplace. "Up." From the "wady," where Rehoboth was, he would have to ascend to high ground, though there was a descent again to Beersheba.

24. "Appeared unto him." Probably in a vision. "God of Abraham thy father." This was possibly to reassure Isaac. Besides, in that time great importance was attached to the customs and beliefs of the ancestors—the God of Abraham would be the God of Abraham's son. "Fear not." The first feeling in Isaac's mind would doubtless be fear. "I am with thee." Isaac knew what Jehovah had done for Abraham. "Isaac quietly leaving place after place, felt the deeps of his soul untouched. What was the loss of a well, or ten wells to him with whom God was for his portion, his exceeding great reward."

25. Isaac, in his action, publicly acknowledged God, and made Beersheba a holy place.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Bear and forbear."
2. Proverbs 16:7; 20:3.
3. "The greatest and sublimest power is simple patience."

Most men would succeed in small things if they were not troubled with great ambitions.

These are the gifts I ask
Of Thee, Spirit serene:
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road;
Good cheer to help me bear the traveler's load;
And, for the hours of rest that come between,
An inward joy in all things heard and seen.

TOPIC FOR THIRD MONTH TENTH, 1907.

LESSONS FROM THE PATRIARCHS.

II. ABRAHAM.

Heb. 11: 8-19.

Second-day, Third mo. 4.—Abraham believed God. Gen. 12: 1-5.
Third-day, Third mo. 5.—He yielded to temptation. Gen. 12: 10-20.

Fourth-day, Third mo. 6.—He overcame the next time. Gen. 13: 1-13.

Fifth-day, Third mo. 7.—He obeyed a hard command. Gen. 22: 1-19.

Sixth-day, Third mo. 8.—He was justified by works. Jas. 2: 21-26.

Seventh-day, Third mo. 9.—A son of Abraham. Luke 19: 1-9.

The faith that lifts a man so high that he can say to one with less claim of right than his own, "Take your choice, and I will take what remains," leads to the clear heights where God is manifest. But it must be faith and not indifference. If Abraham had despised the gift of the promised land, there would be no virtue in his magnanimity toward Lot. But God knew it was not that; so, though he had assured Abraham that the very land which he put into the balance before his selfish nephew would all be his, this deed brought a new declaration, not only of vast possessions, but of uncounted posterity, as well—the crown of the Oriental's hopes and ambitions.

Abraham was human enough. His half-truth—and none the less a lie—as to his kinship with Sarai shows that the Gentile stands in dignified rebuke, while we can but think of Abraham going shamefacedly out of the land of plenty—and of temptation. Better to know the pinch of hardship than to come into overwhelming temptation.

But man's glory "is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall;" so while the rich pastures of the Jordan valley and the luxury of Sodom were none the less known to Abraham than to Lot, they are set with free hand at the disposal of the younger man.

Every faithful man is of Abraham's seed: so we read in the Word of God. But his was not a faith that waits idly on the event—if, indeed, such could be called faith. Works mark every step of faith as we trace his career from the command, "Get thee out," until he is called to offer the child of promise on the mount. When Terah started to the land of Canaan, he got as far as Haran, and dwelt there. But, when under Abraham's guidance, the company again started to go into Canaan, "into the land of Canaan they came."

That little clause rings out exultantly, like the celebration of a victory. It isn't redundancy; it is a declaration of the results when man's obedience meets God's faithfulness. Things taken as a matter of course are apt to be slighted. And they don't "just happen," at least the worth while kind don't. God is always ready. Doubtless, Terah's bones might have rested in the land of promise as well as those of his descendants; but he tarried in Haran. "Well begun is half done," is often short of the truth; but half doing mars many a good beginning.

MISSIONARY QUALIFICATIONS.

In an article read before the recent Missionary Conference held in Richmond, and which was published in the December Advocate, occurs this sentence: "The time has come when the Mission Board should give more attention to the hunting of men." The expression is by one whose experience upon the mission field proved to him that the best are none too good to represent the Gospel of the Kingdom. He has learned that a missionary must be spiritual, zealous for the salvation of souls, and fulfilling the main purpose for which he is sent. He must be efficient, practical, possessed of adaptability and ingenuity. He must be willing to work, verifying the ennobling power of labor. He must resist every tempting influence to adopt the slovenly, dilatory, idle habits of those he would benefit. He should have an honesty that will bear minute inspection, he should be judicious in the expenditure of funds entrusted to him.

He should scorn the least semblance to untruthfulness. He must manifest a teachable spirit. He should be schooled in obedience, that first requisite for every true Christian soldier. He should scrupulously maintain a right relationship to his employing board, respectfully recognizing its authority, accepting its direction.

The writer above quoted further says, the Mission Board should count among its band of workers, "the keenest minded men, the most cultured women, the ablest preachers, the aptest teachers, the most capable artisans that prayer and pains can secure."

C. T. Studd writes from China, "We want the pick of the Christian army out here, where the devil's headquarters and main army are."

I have seen an illustration somewhere telling how people miss their calling in life. There is a board with openings in it, cut out in different sizes and shapes. Someone is working hard to fit all these various pieces into their proper places. He finds the triangles will not go into the circular spaces, nor the squares into the oblong ones. Some of the bits are so small that they pass through without touching the sides of the positions where they are tried. "Just so," said the writer, "many fail to discover their calling." Their egotism leads them to imagine themselves summoned to fill large and important places, for which they do not measure up, or even approach the required dimensions.

The Friends, being comparatively new in mission work, and hitherto with no examining board, have been almost compelled to accept, unchallenged, any candidate for the field. Some have felt called to go whose absence at home is unnoticed. Having achieved nothing here, they accomplish nothing there. Again, others, being accepted by the Mission Board, presume that it will stand responsible for all the misdemeanors and debts they may leave behind them. Sad it is for the foreign mission work (and its reputation) when any lacking in principle, when any who are misfits, when any unqualified are found among its ranks. Sad, indeed, it is when any enter upon so magnificent a work, their highest ideals, apparently, being selfish gain, and personal promotion, concerning themselves about their own supreme importance, insistent for larger authority. The demand is for competency for the sake of confidence, both at home and abroad.

The largest asset of the Foreign Mission Board is undoubtedly those workers, whose sound business principles, wise administration and manhood, admit of unqualified approval. It is a comparatively easy matter to appeal for funds for the support of such as these.

The boards should "hunt for men;" men who are God-possessed, who are select, as the first great pioneer missionary; men of ability, of large ideas, clear judgments, educated, cultured, experienced, their leading qualification, "woe is me, if I preach not the Gospel. The call of the Lord is clear, but the applicant must ring true for every test if approved by Him for this noblest career, this mighty mission of evangelizing.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

It seems that attention should be called again to the appeal published in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of Second month 7th, page 94, for the relief of the starving Chinese. As a duty of common humanity it appeals strongly, and as a missionary opportunity it is of inestimable value. Let us recall the words of Scripture about feeding the hungry, or shutting up our "bowels of compassion," and consider whether we can afford to let this cry for bread go unheard. The President of the United States has given $100; what will Friends in America do?

The best channel is that offered to us in the appeal. Send all funds to the treasurer of the Yearly Meeting Foreign Mission Board, with directions to forward to William Foulks, Bible House, Astor Place, New York City, treasurer of the American Bible Society, who will send it to the Relief Committee of Shanghai Missionary Association, composed of 274 members, representing 19 bodies.

Many recognize that China is the strategic point of attack in the onward movement of the coming Kingdom, and here is the "opportunity of a century to impress China" with the love of Christ and of Christ's people. Shall we not do it? And remember, also, that "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will He pay him again." As an English clergyman once said, "If you like the security, down with the dust." May the love of Christ constrain us.

MEAD A. KELSEY.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I want to express my appreciation and entire concurrence, both with the editorial by Rufus M. Jones and the more recent article upon the same subject ("The Speaking With Tongues"), by Irving King. These two men are experts in the study of mental and spiritual matters, and we should heed their advice as we would the advice of good physicians in care of bodily ailment.

While this outbreak of "speaking with tongues" is an extreme instance of spiritual excitement, and is of such a nature that it is more readily seen to be an abnormal psychic condition, and, therefore, to be guarded against, there are other stages of this same kind of "possession" which are encouraged and even regarded as evidences of the gift of the Holy Ghost, even by those who would condemn the former. They have prevailed extensively in revival meetings amongst Friends of certain type; I refer to the groanings and shoutings and exclamatory exercises, which have neither reason nor conscious as to their origin. The prostrations and rolling and crawling around on the floor on the knees, jumping in the air and various other like proceedings, with which, also, many of our Quaker meeting-houses are familiar. They are all of a piece, and it will be our gain to denounce the one and, at the same time, foster the other. The frenzied tongues is but another manifestation of the same mental condition which too many of our zealous evangelists have been seeking to promote. Indeed, this "speaking with tongues," which conveys no meaning to those who sit by, appears to me to be a more harmless expression than the fanatical ranting which is calculated to unbalance certain persons of susceptible temperament. Intelligible words uttered without reason produce a kind of hypnotic state, similar to the old incantations.

One of the crying needs of our denomination is that our ministers and those who engage in the active work of preaching to the people should understand people. Great stress is laid upon theology, new and old, and we are almost torn asunder by the contending elements. Theology—the science of God—is a pretty abstruse science, and one which, by searching, man may not find out. Why not try to learn the nature of the mind and soul of man, something which is within reach of human achievement, and which every one who deals with souls should know. Instead of this plan being pursued, very often those persons are sent forth to preach in whom there must "run a strong current of neurotic hysteria," if we may judge from the exhibitions of frenzy which we have witnessed.

It is time for Friends to free themselves from these hurtful and disintegrating processes. They have shown themselves to be both hurtful and disintegrating. When one of these wild, excited meetings is held and everything for the time being is "red-hot," in a very short time you find a deadness and an indifference which is appalling. "Wherever it goes it leaves spots of poverty," as Joseph Moore once said of it.

We need enthusiasm; we need zeal and earnestness; we need devotion and consecration—but we do not need frenzy, deliriums and hysteria.

In quietness and confidence shall be your strength.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Mary J. Weaver is holding special meetings at Plattekill, N. Y.

Seneca H. Stevens, minister at Tillson, N. Y., is convalescing from severe illness.

W. O. Trueblood has been called to remain in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., for the ensuing year.

W. H. Commons will take up pastoral work at Yorktown Heights, N. Y., Fourth month 1st.

Caleb H. Hodges, recently recommended to the ministry, is expected to act as pastor at Clintondale, N. Y.

Leverett J. Rugg attended Ferrisburgh Quarterly Meeting, in Vermont, and is assisting in special meetings there.

Rupert H. Stanley, Carthage, Ind., delivered a very acceptable sermon at New Westville, O., on Sabbath evening, 17th inst.

George Taber has opened regular meetings in the chapel at Cornwall Landing, N. Y. He goes down upon First-day evenings from Newburg.

Wm. Castleton Wood will be recorded a minister at Farmington. He is now in charge of the Biblical Department of Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa.

Minnie Bassett is suffering from severe injuries about the head, received a few days ago in falling on an icy pavement near her home, in Mt. Pleasant, O.

The New York Quarterly Meeting Conference, held Second month 21st, was addressed by Mrs. J. S. Comstock, chairman of the Brooklyn Junior Endeavor Union.

Sylvester Jones addressed Earlham College students on missionary and religious subjects, Sabbath, the 17th inst., and gave a chapel lecture on "Political Conditions in Cuba," the following morning.

A Christian Endeavor rally was held at Fountain City, Ind., the 10th inst. There was a good and interesting program in the afternoon, and an enthusiastic address in the evening, delivered by Fred. Smith, Spiceland.

Chester F. Harris, a member at Batavia, N. Y., has been engaged for some months in evangelistic work with Arthur J. Smith. The public press of different cities has highly commended their services. They are at present laboring in Wolfborough, N. H.

Thomas C. Carter has removed from Fall Creek, Fairfield Quarterly Meeting, Wilmington Yearly Meeting, to Wilmington, Ohio. He has been engaged in pastoral work in Fall Creek for five years, and the Friends there will greatly miss him and his wife.

A series of meetings, conducted by Mary N. Cox, was held at New London, Ind., beginning the 13th ult., and continuing for three weeks. The Gospel messages were presented clearly, and many were blessed. Four names were given for membership. Nereus Hodgkin, pastor of the meeting, is doing efficient work.

In the middle paragraph, on page 102, in our issue of the 14th, the sentence, "Some have decided to fill the hour with vocal service, which does not have instruction and religion as its aim," should read, "Some have decided to fill the hour with vocal service, which does have instruction and religion as its aim." The not should not appear in the sentence.

S. S. Frazier, Woodston, Kan., recently visited Friends at Fowler, Kan. He is delighted with the prospect in that new country, and writes very enthusiastically. In order to give an opportunity for families to locate near the new academy, which is running very successfully this year, a tract of land near the town is being laid out in lots of 5 and 10 acres, which will be sold for $50 per acre.

A successful series of meetings, held at Chester, Wilmington Yearly Meeting, closed the 3d inst, after continuing four weeks. Fremont B. Milner, of Fairfield Quarterly Meeting, was the Evangelist. The message to the Church was clear and practical, and suited to the needs of the membership. Some, through a definite consecration, have taken advanced steps in spiritual life. The Gospel message was delivered with great power, resulting in 35 conversions and renewals, with 29 accessions to the church.

The Friends located near Leon, Butler County, Kan., are moving on hopefully in their work. The foundation of their house of worship is laid and the work of completing the building is being carried forward as rapidly as possible. They need this house very much, as the school-house which they are using is quite too small. This location affords a good opportunity for a man of small means to get him a home. George Wilde, Atlanta, Kan., R. F. D., 1, or Reuben Davis, Leon, Kan., R. F. D., 1, will be glad to answer all inquiries.

Bear Creek Quarterly meeting was held at Earlham, Iowa, the 8th, 9th and 10th inst. Charles W. Sweet, Des Moines, and Anna M. Farr, Oskaloosa, were in attendance, and their ministry was very acceptable. The following is taken from the minutes of the meeting of ministry and oversight: "We have had presented to us at this time the subject of the Deity of Jesus Christ and the Scriptural basis for this doctrine of the Church. We wish it to be understood that we stand squarely by this doctrine of the Church, and have no unity with the various teachings of Unitarianism being promulgated in some quarters." It was decided to hold the Fifth month quarterly meeting hereafter at Bear Creek, instead of Linden, as heretofore.

We are in receipt of a number of pamphlets, which a committee of English Friends are distributing among their own members and "attenders." They include: "John Bright on the True Greatness of a Nation," "The Spiritual Legacies of George Fox," by Chas. H. Spurgeon; "The Test of a Church," by Rufus M. Jones, and "The Lay Ministry," by John Wilhelm Rowntree. The committee is known as "The Yorkshire 1905 Committee." They are active in a number of different lines. One is a visiting of meetings, and in the report upon this work they note some deficiencies. "In many meetings," they say, "the lack of social opportunities of a simple character seem to cut at the life and progress of the congregation." This same committee arranges for special addresses to be given at different places, also, "week-end-settlements" and "tramps." On the whole, the committee seems to feel that there is a need for the work they are doing, and that the results justify the efforts.

A seven weeks' revival has just closed at Amboy, Ind., resulting in one of the greatest spiritual awakenings the community has experienced. The meetings were conducted by F. H. Tarmohlen, who labored most earnestly, preaching 85 sermons. His messages, which were delivered without fear or favor, touched the hearts of the unsaved and were especially practical and fitting to the membership. Chas. P. Baldwin, one of the new converts, very ably and faithfully assisted throughout the meetings. There were between 80 and 90 conversions and renewals. The entire membership is highly pleased with the efficient and far-reaching labors of F. H. Tarmohlen, and also his worthy wife, who has been a faithful and appreciated co-laborer. One very noticeable and gratifying result of the meetings is the change in the Sabbath-school. The attendance has been more than doubled, and the collections several times greater than ever before in the history of the school.

Bloomington Quarterly Meeting, Ind., was held the 16th and 17th inst. Lewis E. Stout, general superintendent of Evangelistic work in Western Yearly Meeting, was in attendance and preached both days to the edification of all. This quarterly meeting was set up seventy-one years ago the 13th inst. The meeting-house has recently been repaired, new seats put in, and a furnace installed. De. Ella Leonard is doing pastoral work in this local meeting. The academy is a strong factor for good in this place.

John and Nettie Riley are engaged in mission work in San Jose. In a recent letter they say: "Several drunkards have been saved, and a real revival spirit is among us. We have good fellowship with Caroline Hunnicutt, who is pastor of Friends' Church here, and doing good work. She read a paper before the Pastors' Union on 'Christianity and Woman,' covering three points—woman in missionary work, in temperance work, and in the ministry. It was heartily received by the pastors."

Lines presented to John T. Hunnicutt, by a young friend, Twelfth month 25, 1906, which give a true picture of this sainted Friend, whose earth-life closed at his old home near Economy, Ind., First month 10, 1907, at the ripe age of ninety years, one month, and fifteen days.

PSALM 103-14 AND 18.

Full ninety years thy mortal frame
Has borne the seasons' heat and cold,
Lived with sincere, unselfish aim
A rounded life does not seem old.
We but begin the life God-given,
When Death's call changes it to Heaven.

—Rev. 1-8.

Thy children's children love thy name;
Thy great-grandchildren shall revere it,
Each kindly word, a kindled flame,
On memory's tablet shall endear it.
Think not when life seems cold and drear,
Thy name will be forgotten here.

—Job 19:13 and 14.

When Slavery's cry rang through the land,
Thy ballot struck for freedom's right;
True patriots never faltered, and
The slaves were freed, God led the fight.
The crowning victory of the age
Was written then on history's page.

—Psalm 98:1.

When called to fight a mightier foe,
The Devil's workshop, the saloon,
The home of misery and woe,
Whose end will never come too soon,
Thy ballot never failed us then,
In battling this destroyer of men.

Live on, live on, thou faithful Friend,
Enjoy life's blessings to the last;
Take now thine ease, fear not the end,
The future but repeats the past;
A useful life, a peaceful close,
Reward of labor, is repose.—Rev. 22:21.

Some day, not far, those dimming eyes
Shall see the vision we have dreamed,
The end of human strife, the Prize—
Companionship with God, redeemed,
A dream no longer will it be,
A living, grand, Eternity.—Isa. 57:15.

boys, and we feel a remedy akin to that youths should be brought to bear upon our unruly Southern neighbors.

Lottie Wallau was tried in New York City last week for administering poison to her mother, an aged lady who was suffering intensely from an incurable disease, and who often begged her nurse to end her life in order to relieve her from continued agony. The veracity of this story cannot be sustained at this time, but the circumstance affords an occasion for considering the practice of what doctors call "euthanasia," or the relief of excruciating pain in incurable diseases by causing death. Physicians of Philadelphia had a spirited discussion on the subject in one of their recent meetings, and the prevailing opinion was that it was never justifiable. As long as there is life, it is incumbent upon physicians to prolong it, to relieve suffering where such is possible without terminating life, but when life must be sacrificed for the relief of pain, then pain, even in its most exaggerated form should be allowed to continue.

The stand which the Harvard University authorities have taken on football rules seems to us entirely justifiable.
 Foot-ball at Harvard has become a very expensive affair, and with a large number of students has been allowed to eclipse academic work. President Eliot proposes to remedy the evil by limiting expenditures and by cutting down the admission prices to games. The committee having the matter in charge has yielded to President Eliot's suggestions. Of course, the sporting elements in the university are much put out by the proposed innovations, and have appealed to President Roosevelt to intercede in their behalf. Final action has been postponed until the President is heard from. We trust, however, that the changes suggested by President Eliot will prevail, since the proposed limitations promise to place the game on its own merits, and to remove the abnormalities which commercialism is bound to bring, and which destroy the healthy spirit of sport.

The newly elected Russian Douma will meet the fifth of Third month. It will not be called to order by the Czar as the first Douma was, but as soon as the Douma is organized, the ministerial program with the fundamental budget will be submitted to the body, and left to pursue its own course. According to the latest returns, the Radicals are maintaining their lead, with 40 per cent.
 elected; the Liberals, including the Constitutional Democrats and the Conservatives, have each about 25 per cent., and the remaining 10 per cent. of delegates are divided between Nationalists and Indefinites. Made up thus no party can carry its entire program into effect.
 In order to accomplish anything, compromise must be used, and with wise discretion this situation may be a blessing. If the leaders succeed in organizing the various forces sufficiently to carry measures, the feat will have a wholesome effect, and the outcome will probably be more acceptable to the Russian people than the policy of any one party.

STRAWBRIDGE & CLOTHIER

"Profits of Peace." The following quotation is interesting:

What we "prophets of peace" claim is only this: That the world not only progresses toward certain ideals, but that it has attained them without a cataclysmic change in human nature.

Take as a case in point the history of warfare itself and the growth of the judiciary. Read again our history books, and see how man-to-man encounter evolved into tribal war; how tribal war evolved into national war; how private vengeance came to be limited by public opinion, and was at last supplanted by the regular system of courts and jury, and how, finally, these courts gained a scope and a power that was never dreamed of—except by "prophets"—at the beginning. It was not always compulsory that a man should take his grievance to court; he might himself avenge a wrong done him. If we had lived in those times—and they were not so very long ago—and a "prophet" had said to us: "If a man kills your brother you must take the case to court and let a jury decide it," we should doubtless have cried, "Impossible, impracticable, dreamer! I will rather summon all my henchmen and retainers, and I will make bitter war upon my brother's murderer until I have destroyed all his possessions and have done himself to death." But nowadays we do not consider ourselves dreamers because we take our grievances to court and are protected, not by our own swords, but by the strong arm of

NO MISTAKE HERE.

DISCOVERY OF A PROOF-READER.

Even a proof-reader may make mistakes unless careful reading is maintained all the time.

It makes a lot of difference sometimes, just how a thing is read.

This is the tale:

"No tea and not one drop of coffee," ordered the doctor—and I rebelled. But alas, with nerves that saw, felt and heard things that were not, rebellion was useless.

"With the greatest reluctance I gave up these lifelong companions, and drank milk, milk—until the very step of the milkman grew hateful.

"My nerves were some better, but breakfast without some warm beverage grew wearisome, and bid fair to be entirely slighted. And with a brain that for nine hours daily must work hard, ever demanding nourishment, the failing appetite was a serious proposition.

"Then in despair, Postum was tried. I had tasted it once and heartily disliked the pale watery compound, but now, literally starving for a hot drink, I read and re-read the directions on the package with the critical eye of the proof-reader, following them out to the letter, and lo! the rich brown liquid of the advertisements.

"Not one, but three cups, disappeared, and since then Postum has been my sole warm beverage, unfailingly refreshing and helpful; both body and nerves testifying to its helpfulness by new strength and vigor." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

the law, enforced by the police. Is not this, so far, the realization of an ideal?

Yes, perhaps we are dreamers, but we base our dreams upon the experience of the past. We believe in evolution, and we seek to read the lessons that it would teach us. We are striving to follow the pointing of the finger of progress, rather than to stay just where we are. We are listening to the new voices—inarticulate as yet—in this new world of ours, which, through our immigrant problems, are whispering strange things about internationalism, neighborliness, good will, peace!

BOOK NOTICES.

"Webster's International Dictionary," published by the G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass. Price, $10.75.

No one ever gets too old for a dictionary; sometimes dictionaries get too old for everyone. A book which should be in every home and school library is an up-to-date dictionary, and the most convenient and most complete dictionary on the market is Webster's International. Noah Webster succeeded in producing the first unabridged American dictionary almost eighty years ago. It has passed several editions, but has always been considered the standard dictionary by a very considerable portion of the American people, and at present is the final authority for spelling and pronunciation in the Government printing office at Washington, and 99 per cent. of the newspaper offices. The chief advantage of the International is that it is conveniently bound in one substantial volume. One does not have to search for one among a number of volumes, which often is filed out of place, in order to get the book containing the desired information. While the work is thus conveniently bound it is thoroughly modern and comprehensive. In addition to a dictionary it has a gazetteer of the world; also a biographical dictionary; a pronouncing vocabulary of Greek and Latin names; Scripture proper names and common English names; questions, words and phrases and colloquial expressions from Greek, Latin and modern languages; also abbreviations and constructions used in writing.

"The Heart of Christianity," by T. S. Linscott, published by Bradley-Garretson Company, Brantford, Ont. Price, $1.50.

The first part of the work is devoted to a discussion of sin; its origin and results. In this field the author bases his conclusion upon empirical observations, and they are in the main, just and helpful. The treatment, however, suffers some from too close use of old terminology, a fault, which for the ordinary reader, may be an advantage. The author finds a deliverance from sin in the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit, and his discussion of the work and offices of the Holy Spirit contains much that is suggestive. On the whole, however, this part of the subject, which he treats under several heads in the latter part of the book, is rather elementary, and, unless corrected by a broader view of the subject, would have a tendency to lead one into the error so prevalent among Christians, who find the final authority for action in individual leading,

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

FEW PEOPLE KNOW HOW USEFUL IT IS IN PRESERVING HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after eating onions and other odorous vegetables, and completely neutralizes a disagreeable breath arising from any habit or indulgence.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal says: "I advise Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

unrefined by enlightened judgment carefully weighing the manifestation of the same Spirit on the Church at large. In other words, the author fails to grasp the full significance of what might be called the corporate leading of the Holy Spirit.

The teacher approached one little fellow, who was presented for the first time, and inquired his name, for the purpose of placing it on the roll.

"Well," said the youngster, "they call me Jimmie for short; but my maiden name is James."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

Resurgam.

They tell me thou art dead, and lead me here
That I may say farewell. Beside the bier
I stand and see a form silent and still;
No heart-throbs stir the breast nor pulses thrill.
I speak thy name; no answering voice replies;
No lovelight glances from thy darkened eyes;
For thou art dead. I look upon thy face,
So cold and still, where I was wont to trace
And read each passing thought; 'tis calm and restful now.
Some kindly hand has smoothed the furrows from thy brow;
The marks of time and care are all erased,
And in their stead are joy ineffable, and chaste
And holy peace which passeth understanding. These say
To me, "There is no death." The radiant day
Is born of night; it comes not till the ray
Of heaven's orb dispels the evening's shade.
The fragrant flower that brightens hill and glade
Awakes from winter's sleep where in the earth was laid
The seed which held the living germ; not death, but life.
Calls its fresh beauty forth, and fragrance rife
Fills the glad air. There is no death. The silent form
On which I gaze returns to dust; but vibrant, warm, Exultant life springs from this clay. The fitful storm
Of that brief span called life is but the night
Which ushers in the morning's glorious light;
And that called death is but the winter's sleep
From which the soul, clothed in fresh beauty, breathing fragrance deep,
Awakes to everlasting spring. There is no death.
What once has lived, quickened by the life-giving breath
Of Him who is life's essence, must ever live;
And death is but the gate which doth an entrance give
To fields Elysian where the raptured soul
Shall live, and still live on, while ceaseless ages roll.

Events and Comments.

The liveliest scene in the National House of Representatives this session occurred last week, when the final vote on the Ship Subsidy Bill was taken. The vote was very close, but the bill was passed. It calls for a maximum appropriation of $2,660,000, and a minimum of $1,300,000, and only four lines of mail steamships are provided for: One from an Atlantic port to Brazil; one from an Atlantic port to Argentina; one from a Gulf port to Brazil, and one from a Pacific port to Panama, Peru and Chile.

The Salvation Army is taking advantage of a recent decision by Secretary Strauss to the effect that it is legal for States to import labor. For some years the Salvation Army has been importing immigrants into Canada. This year, it has made arrangements for 30,000. The Salvation Army officials now hope to make arrangements with some of the Southern State officials to bring a large number of immigrants to that section of the country. The move is a favorable comment on the present prosperous conditions in America.

William Dean Howells has given us a new definition for youth and old age. He recently celebrated his seventieth birthday, on which occasion he is reported to have said: "Like my esteemed contemporary, 'Mark Twain,' I am still young, and expect to remain so until the end. I am still working, and expect to do better things than I have yet done. I do not like to be idle. My theory of life is that we are young so long as we are able to think new thoughts, so long as we still see beauty in life, so long as life still holds charms for us. When a writer can no longer think beautiful thoughts and convey them cleverly to others, then he is old."

The new "Sunday Law," which went into effect throughout Canada last week, prohibits any kind of work on that First day, except that of "necessity or mercy." Our Canadian friends are finding considerable difficulty in defining the exceptions to a strict day of rest, just as the ancient Rabbis did. It is somewhat amusing to see what Canada legislators consider as "necessary or merciful." The statute prohibits the advertising on a secular day of any performance which is not allowed to be given on First day, and it is unlawful, under the act, to bring or to sell or distribute in the Dominion on First day any foreign newspaper or publication classified as a newspaper.

MORE BOXES OF GOLD

AND MANY GREENBACKS.

Three hundred and twenty-five boxes of gold and greenbacks will be sent to persons who write the most interesting and truthful letters of experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum.

2. Give name and account of one or more coffee drinkers who have been hurt by it, and have been induced to quit and use Postum.

3. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

4. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make it clear, black, and with a snappy, rich taste?

5. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonfuls to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, and beginning at that time when actual boiling starts, boil fully fifteen minutes more to extract the flavor and food value. (A piece of butter the size of a pea will prevent boiling over.) This contest is confined to those who have used Postum prior to the date of this advertisement.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters; just plain, truthful statements.

Contest will close June 1, 1907, and no letters received after that date will be admitted. Examinations of letters will be made by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd. Their decisions will be fair and final, and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece will be sent to each of the five writers of the most interesting letters, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best, a $2 greenback to the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write, and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends, and see how many can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause, and costs the competitors absolutely nothing.

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

AN ORDINARY SAINT.—IV.

He was a short, unimpressive-looking man, though his large head attracted attention and made one turn back for a second glance. He had a marked nasal twang in voice, which made every one look up when he spoke, and it generally made the thoughtless laugh and want to imitate him. He spent his eighty years on a small farm, picking stones, building stone walls, fighting witchgrass and weeds, in stern conflict with potato rust and potato bugs, and getting a bare living for himself and his family. He had no education, except what a few weeks in an old-fashioned district school gave him, and yet he had a pretty good mastery of the English which was spoken in his neighborhood. He enjoyed reading and was an easy victim to a book agent. By intercourse and reading, he slowly educated himself and made himself able to take his part in all matters that concerned a citizen of an inland town. His opinion was always worth having, and it was sure to be put into a phrase which would be passed about the town and fastened into the memory of those who heard it. He never once in his life swung out of his ordinary orbit. There were no flights of fancy, no spurts of enthusiasm, no uprushes of genius—the entire life was a plain, steady, straightforward march through the daily routine of commonplace duties. And yet—and yet it was one of the noblest lives I have ever known. It exhibited almost every quality which we demand in a saint. There was at the heart of the man a religious passion which throbbed in everything he did. Nobody knew, he least of all, what his theological system was. He never bothered to think it out. But nobody ever hoed a row of potatoes with him, or pitched a load of hay, without discovering his religion. His religion showed itself even to his sheep and cows and horses. He did not learn how to express himself until he was long past middle life, and he was already growing old when he learned to pray in public, but before there were any words which told of that religious passion and devotion we all knew it was there. It radiated from him like light from a luminous body. Little children always believed in him and enjoyed being with him, and he loved them with a warmth which was a surprise to those who knew only the matter-of-fact side of his nature.

He was the kind of man who would keep a church alive if he was the only person left in the township. Neither weather, nor work, ever made any difference with him. He was sitting in his place when it was time for meeting to begin. Others came and went, he was a fixture. Monthly meetings, quarterly meetings, yearly meetings could all count on him, and he was always concerned for the life, order, solidity and power of the meeting. It was the same spirit, whether he were building stone wall to stand the winter frost or whether he was speaking to business in favor of a policy which would strengthen the church.

But the finest trait of this farmer life was the spirit of help, the thought of others, which had become second nature in the man. He would hurry through his own haying and then start off with his scythe to help neighbors who had been belated. If there was anybody in the neighborhood sick or in trouble, day after day that scythe would be swung in his grass and our ordinary saint would stand by him until the harvest was over. The same thing happened in the spring at planting time, and even in the winter, as soon as his own pile of wood was hauled, he was off with his horse to help somebody else draw his year's store of fuel. It was sheer, unalloyed generosity, it was unmixed kindness, and it all flowed out of the religion of the man.

He had trials of the mountainous sort to travel over. Nearly every kind of hard baptism and bitter cup came to him during his life. He played the man in every situation, and though the drama of his life was on a small stage, with few spectators, he played his part like another Greatheart clear through to the end.

R. M. J.

A MOMENTOUS DECISION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The most important court decision that has ever been rendered in this country on the legality of a saloon license has just been given in Indiana. Our Friend, Charles E. Newlin, has long held, on the ground of important previous judicial decisions, that the granting of a license to sell intoxicating liquors is unconstitutional. He resolved to get a judicial decision on the question. He organized a group of interested men in Indianapolis for the purpose of bringing a test case. These men secured the services, as attorney, of Wilson S. Doan, son of Amos Doan, late clerk of Western Yearly Meeting, and a remonstrance was brought against the granting of a license to a certain applicant. The remonstrance was overruled and the license granted. An appeal was at once taken, and the case was brought for decision before the Circuit Court of Boone County, Indiana, with Judge Samuel R. Artman on the bench, who rendered his decision the 13th of Second month before a crowded court-room.

The decision is so important and likely to become such an historic ruling that we have concluded to print the larger part of it for the benefit of our readers.

The decision itself leaves nothing to be desired. It does not compromise or wobble a single jot. It declares in unequivocal fashion that the State has no constitutional power to license a saloon. This is what it says:

"It must be held that the State cannot, under the guise of a license, delegate to the saloon business a legal existence, because to hold that it can is to hold that the State may sell and delegate the right to make widows and orphans, the right to make murderers, the right to produce idiots and lunatics, the right to fill orphanages, poorhouses, insane asylums, jails and penitentiaries, and the right to furnish subjects for the hangman's gallows."

That is an answer "without horns or teeth," as Luther would say. It now remains to be seen whether Judge Artman's decision will be sustained by the Supreme Court of the State. He himself points out that to reverse his decision would mean one of two things: (1) Either the saloon business is lawful at common law, or (2) A business which is unlawful at common law, a business which endangers the health, comfort, safety, morals and welfare of the people may be legalized for money. There is a long array of judicial decisions to the effect that the saloon business is unlawful at common law, so that it would seem as though the court, if it reverses this decision would have to hold that the State can, for money, legalize an evil which the common law does not allow.

In any case this is a momentous decision and marks an epoch in the long struggle for the outlawry and ultimate destruction of the nefarious traffic, and we are thankful for the part Friends have taken in the case. The closing words of the judge are full of dignity and solemnity and are worthy of the important occasion:

"With due appreciation of the responsibilities of the occasion, conscious of my obligations, under oath to Almighty God and to my fellow-man, I cannot, by a judgment of this Court, authorize the granting of a saloon license, and the demurrer to the amended remonstrance is, therefore overruled, the amended remonstrance is sustained, and the application is dismissed at the cost of the applicant."

CHRIST CALLS YOU.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

The three sweetest words that have ever fallen on human ears are these three spoken by Jesus Christ, "Come unto Me!" There is the Gospel in three syllables. All the libraries of human philosophy, if boiled down to their essence, cannot compare with them. To whom is this cordial invitation addressed? It is to every one, and if, my dear reader, you have never come, it is to you directly. Observe how short and simple and summary is the call. It is the urgency of love. Come! cries the hospitable Master of the Gospel feast; My supper is prepared, and all things are ready. Come! cries the voice of yearning affection; you have stayed away too long; I have a great gift for you; whosoever cometh unto Me hath eternal life! Love is always urgent, and divine authority has a right to be. As if it were not enough for Jesus Christ to have uttered the gracious invitation himself, the closing words of your Bible will re-echo the call—"the Spirit and the bride say, come! And let him that heareth say come! And let him that is athirst come! and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." These last words sound like a melody from the music of heaven.

There are many invitations that you are constantly accepting. There are business appeals to you that you never think of putting aside. Books open their inviting pages, and your thirst for knowledge or entertainment leads you to them. A cordial invitation to the table of a hospitable friend would command your instant attention. You admit the strong inducements in all these cases, and yield to them willingly. No less a personage than the Son of God presents to you the most pressing invitation, and holds out to you the supreme inducement of sins forgiven, heart purified, and a new life imparted which will go on enlarging and brightening to all eternity. Jesus Christ does not present to you a system of doctrine and ask you to study it; he does not paint for you an ideal and ask you to admire it; he offers himself. Jesus Christ is Christianity. It is a person, not a system that you need; a person who atones for your sins, a person who teaches you how to live, a person who is able to help you; yea, a person who will enter into your inmost soul and abide there as a constant presence and an almighty power. Jesus says to you, "He that hath the Son hath life." The most extraordinary man in the first century, and whose trail of light has illumined all the subsequent centuries, declared, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life I live is by faith on the Son of God."

Perhaps you attend already some Christian church, and enjoy a good sermon, and read often your Bible and accept it as the inspired Word of God. You may often pray, and even intend to become a Christian before you die. But churches, sermons, Bible-reading, prayers and good intentions do not save your soul. Jesus Christ makes the Christian. He says: "Come unto Me." The Holy Spirit saith, "Come;" and of all the multitudes who were seen by John as praising God in the white robes of heaven, it is declared that they had "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." The Christ whom they praise in Heaven is the Christ whom they obeyed and followed on earth. That life is only the continuation, enlargement and consummation of the life begun here when they received Jesus Christ into their souls.

"Just how shall I come to Christ?" To this proper question I would reply that "coming" implies action on your part; it is more than an opinion, a feeling or a desire. It is a positive step. The only faith in Christ that is of the least avail is the faith that acts. In two ways your faith may act—prayer and practice. Your sins lie as a heavy score against you; pray fervently for forgiveness. Your heart is unclean; pray for cleansing. You are morally weak, deplorably weak; pray for strength. All this prayer will not avail if you do nothing toward the answering of your own petitions. Obey Christ! Begin to do what he bids you. This touches the very core of character and conduct. This means the putting the knife right through your besetting sins. This means a radical change of conduct, and a ready, sincere, conscientious obedience to a new Master. The first thing you do simply to obey Jesus Christ marks the change; that is the first evidence of conversion.

Christ is very gentle and patient and kind with new beginners who are sincere in coming to him. He says, "Learn of Me" in very much the same way that a kind teacher overlooks a boy who is attempting his first "pothooks" in writing, or a loving mother directs and helps her baby who is making his first attempts at walking. The help He will give you is direct spiritual help acting on your will and your affections. Remember that you are dealing with a divine, all-powerful Person, who can act and does act directly on you and me in a supernatural fashion. If you do not accept that great fact, you reject the A, B, C, of Christianity. Jesus Christ, when He calls you, promises His supernatural help to you in the coming; and when you begin to obey Him, He tenderly says to you, "My burden I will make light; My yoke is lined with love; My grace is sufficient for you." The admission of Jesus Christ into your soul brings a new and a divine power.

"If I come to Christ, must I not deny myself and take up a cross?" Yes, you must deny sinful self. There is hardly a noble deed to be wrought in this world, but it requires self-denial of some sort. Jesus Christ does not make Christians simply to make them comfortable; he provides no palace cars for transportation of self-coddling disciples. It is what you and I give up for Christ and our fellow-men that makes us rich. Rejoice that he who bore our sins on the cross seeks to have us "bear one another's burdens," and so fulfil the law of love. Do not, I entreat you, bargain for a cheap and easy religion. Following Christ brings some uphill climbs, but victory and holy joys await us at the top; crosses then will turn into shining crowns. Coming to Christ must not end with the coming; it is those who follow His leading and endure to the end who will be saved. "Abide in Me, and ye shall bear much fruit;" and that is the one sure way to be delivered from the curse and infamy of a barren life.

THE INTERPRETATION AND USE OF THE BIBLE.

BY ELBERT RUSSELL.

XIV. Principles of Literary Criticism.

Turning to methods of composition, we find here, also, that Hebrew writers' ways are not ours. A modern historian seeks to examine sources, weigh evidence, decide probabilities, and then write history in his own language, reducing all to a single point of view. An examination of the works of Biblical historians shows that, as a rule, they followed an opposite course. They compiled their narratives of extracts from their sources, using now one, now another, to get the fullest or best account. Sometimes when they found divergent accounts, instead of choosing between them, they put both in, to make sure of getting the truth. Consequently, we often find great differences in style and representation, and double accounts of the same thing. Even Luke, who was, to some extent, under Greek influences, follows the Jewish method in his Gospel, and in the Acts. The language of his preface (Luke 1: 1-4) is an approximation to classical Greek; the rest of chapters 1 and 2 is in simple Greek, full of Aramaic idioms and syntax; parts of the rest of the Gospel are extracts from Mark, with, here and there, a little refinement of phrase. In the Acts, the first twelve chapters are quite distinct in style from the narratives of Paul's life. It is evident Luke has compiled his work in large measure, only retouching the expression at times. In the Old Testament we have a chance to see how a Jewish historian composed, by comparing Samuel and Kings with the parallel accounts in Chronicles. The writer of Chronicles has used the older works, as sources, omitting much matter, and adding some from other sources, but for the most part, copying the accounts in Kings and Samuel verbatim, or with slight changes by way of explanation or embellishment.

To determine, in any given case, whether a work is a compilation from different sources, and in what sense it bears some man's name, the greatest attention must be paid the diction, style, and point of view. A few illustrations will suffice for this. A reader of the Old Testament soon learns to distinguish two different styles of composition. One, usually called the priestly style, is well illustrated in Chronicles. It is characterized by interest in the ritual worship; is fond of genealogies; is minute in describing rites, ceremonies, and buildings pertaining to worship; abounds in repetitions and set phrases; is given to representing everything in idealized terms, and done strictly according to the Levitical law, unless in cases of open and hastily punished sin, and tends to represent God as abstract and far from men. The other, the prophetic style, is well illustrated in the sections of the Book of Kings, which deal with the prophets. (See I Kgs. 17; II Kgs. 10.) They are characterized by vividness and picturesqueness of style; by human interest; by a tendency to represent God in human terms; are especially interested in the doings of the prophets and kings; are concerned with the struggle against foreign religion, idolatry and immorality, rather than with the Levitic worship, and represent things as going on with the sanction of the best kings and prophets, quite at variance with the later Levitical law.

If, after a little observation of the distinguishing characteristics of these two types of literature, one go to the Pentateuch, one will find, running through it, narratives in one style and then narratives in the other. Every child who reads Genesis, learns to skip the tedious genealogies and stories of the origin of ceremonial institutions, and lists of names, which belong to the priestly sections, and to select the exquisite stories of the prophetic sections. That these variations are due to compilation from different documents is evident when one notices that the names "God" and "Jehovah" vary with the change of style, and that things are often told twice with differences in the point of view. The account of Creation in Gen. 1: 1-2: 4, differs in the order of events, and in the name of God, in diction, and in style, from that in 2: 5-25. The meaning of the name Isaac is differently explained in Gen. 17: 16-19, and in 18: 9-15 (21: 6). Such names as Beth-el, Beersheba and Israel are twice explained (Gen. 28: 19; 35: 15; 21: 31; 26: 31-33; 32: 28; 35: 10.) In Gen. 17: 17, Abraham is represented as so old that his having a child was beyond natural possibilities. In Gen. 25: 1, 2, he is represented as marrying, after Sarah's death, and having six children. Section 27: 46-28: 9, differs appreciably in style as well as in the motive it ascribes for Jacob's departure to Padan Aram from 27: 1-45. These are evidently not from the same original writer. One learns to recognize, also, in certain parts of the Old Testament, the style that is usually called deuteronomic, because it uses the characteristic words and phrases, the hortatory tone and prophetic spirit, the hatred of idolatry, the passionate loyalty to Jehovah, which belong to the book of Deuteronomy. First Samuel, for instance, shows two strata of narrative, one of which is older and cruder, and the other is more near the Deuteronomic. (Read together consecutively, 1 Sam. 9: 1; 10: 13; 11: 1-15; 13: 1; 14: 48; 17: 1; 18: 16, and then 1 Sam. 8: 1-22; 10: 17-27; 12: 1-25; 15: 1-16; 23, and note the difference in style and point of view.)

No theory of the origin of the books of the Bible that ignores matters such as these, or that does not give them the best possible explanation, can be accepted by those who love truth as they love God and the Bible. The proper way to decide such matters is, not to make up an opinion as to how we would have inspired a book, if we were God, nor to say from our own imaginations how God must have produced His revelation, but to go earnestly to the Book we reverently believe God did inspire, and find out from it the method He did use to produce it.

LESSONS OF NATURE.

BY ADA PARKHURST-CAMPBELL.

"We are never tired so long as we can see far enough." The very words rested me. I had been reading Emerson's "Nature," and when I came to this sentence it soothed and refreshed me as a cup of cool water on a midsummer's day.

Often had I felt the truth of this sentence, but in a vague, unexpressed way. In my early days, the days of dreams and day visions, it had taken the form of a strong desire to let my eyes look across a stretch of landscape so illimitable that only the horizon in the distance should be visible. I did not care for mountains—the thought of them smothered me—I wanted to see, to have free range for my sight, not to be hedged in by oppressive towers of earth. It may have been but provincialism, being prairie-born, but I longed to feel the breeze that came from the misty rim of the South and blew across the intervening stretch, free and unchecked, to the misty purple of the North.

That, I take it now, was merely an expression of the "deathless heathen." As the instincts of primitive man concern the physical, so in the child are the senses first appealed to.

Gradually, the intense desire to view the infinite with my physical eyes lessened, or rather turned into a new channel. With the first glimpse into the realm of science, I realized that here was a well so deep its waters could never run dry. The only limit was that of my own capacity, and I soon realized how restricted that was.

And yet this thought did not tire me. Instead, it was the inspiration that kept me from growing weary. Had I been able to comprehend, how cramped would have been the boundaries of the universe and how savorless existence in its self-sufficiency!

Nature took on a new immortal loveliness; marks that had heretofore been but marks of beauty became revelations of wonder. The veining of a leaf was no longer a beautiful witchery—it held the essence of a world and the seed which had sent up the tiny shoot was more marvelous in its inherent power than the force which built up the Pyramids of Egypt.

Then came the sight of the spiritual. The physical and mental had been stepping-stones to the height from which we view with mortal eyes, the things of immortality. Here, indeed was the horizon boundless. At first, the very vastness seemed overwhelming and there came back again something of that sense of awe of the incomprehensible which the child had felt in the presence of the night when the heavens had been illumined with its myriads of stars. But just as the stars gradually brought assurance of the all-pervading goodness, so the illuminations of experience which time brought forth, softened the feeling of awe and brought with them a sweet sense of nearness to the Great Presence.

Georgetown, Ill.

LICENSE OF LIQUOR SALOON UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Decision of Judge Samuel R. Artman, of Boone Circuit, rendered at Lebanon, Indiana.

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE.

The ultimate question for decision in this case is whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors, at retail, for beverage purposes, can be legally licensed.

The court has not inclination to evade or side-step this proposition. The conclusions at which it has arrived have been reached after long, patient and mature deliberation and the most consideration that the court is capable of giving the question.

THE STATUTE ON THE SUBJECT.

It must be conceded at the outset, that there is a statute of the State purporting to authorize such a license. Burns Revised Statutes, 1901, Sec. 7276 et seq. It is not every act of the Legislature that is the law. Only the valid acts of the Legislature are law. It necessarily follows that the decision of the ultimate question involves the determination of the validity or invalidity of this license statute. To insure a logical and intelligent discussion of this question, it is well to first ascertain and state the basis upon which it is to be determined.

It may be considered, as settled, that this statute was enacted in strict accordance, and hence the question of its validity will not be measured by the standard of constitutional formalities.

AUTHORITY OF THE LEGISLATURE.

Did the Legislature have the authority to enact the statute? Can the Legislature authorize the licensing for a consideration, of the sale of intoxicating liquors, at retail, for beverage purposes? This is the basis upon which the ultimate question is to be determined. It is a question of power, and not one of formality.

It is contended by counsel for the applicant that the right of the Legislature to authorize the granting of a saloon license is absolute and unqualified under the police power of the State.

In other words, he contends that this alleged right is to be measured by the fundamental principle of government, technically called the police power.

DEFINITION OF POLICE POWER.

It is, then, proper, in order that we may be fully understood in this discussion, to ascertain as nearly as possible what is meant by the police power of the State. This principle of government or power is, after all, not very easily defined. It may be said to be the power to enforce the right and prohibit the wrong. It is the power to enforce the chief end of organized government, which is the preservation and development of the good order, the peace, safety, health, morals and welfare of the people.

In the case of the State vs. Corhardt, 145 Ind. 451, the court said:

"The police power of a State is recognized by the courts to be one of wide sweep. It is exercised by the State in order to promote the health, safety, comfort, morals, and welfare of the public. The right to exercise this power is said to be inherent in the people in every free government. It is not a grant, derived from or under any written constitution."

SELF-PROTECTION CHIEF END OF GOVERNMENT.

Accepting this declaration as correct, which we must, the police power is, then, the inherent right in the people of every free government to promote the health, safety, comfort, morals and welfare of the people. The right being inherent, it does not depend upon the language of the written constitution. Self-protection is the chief end of organized government, and there is inherent in every free government, without regard to the language of the written constitution, the power to promote the health, safety, comfort, morals and welfare of the people, and, this being true, just ordinary common sense suggests the corollary proposition, that there is inherent in every free government, without regard to the language of the written constitution, a prohibition against doing anything that naturally and necessarily endangers the health, safety, comfort, morals and welfare of the people.

This gives the question, involved in this case, as wide a range, if not wider, than contended for by the remonstrators. In other words, there is contained in this inherent power and prohibition of government all, if not more, than there is in the specific provisions of the constitution set out by the remonstrators. To determine this question from the police power standpoint necessarily determines it from the constitutional standpoint.

Hence, we accept the challenge of counsel for the applicant to discuss and determine the question in this case from the viewpoint of the police power.

THE FUNCTION OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

By section one of the Bill of Rights it is declared that the government of this State is instituted for the peace, safety and well-being of the people. This is merely expressing in written language the inherent power of the State to provide for the self-protection of its constituent members; it is merely a direct expression of the grant of the police power. While it is denominated the "Bill of Rights," it is equally the "Bill of Wrongs," because, when the people have thus expressed the ends to be attained by organized society, they, in legal effect, declare a prohibition against anything that will naturally and inherently endanger the accomplishment of those purposes.

LEGAL STATUS OF THE SALOON BUSINESS.

What is wrong cannot be lawful, and whatever is right is legitimate and lawful. In the absence of any license statute, what is the legal status of the saloon business? Does it stand upon the same basis as the business of the farmer, the manufacturer or the merchant?

In other words, is it one of the inherent common law rights of citizenship to engage in the saloon business? Upon this question courts of last resort and eminent attainments have taken different views. In fact, the Supreme Court of Indiana has answered the question in both the affirmative and the negative.

COMMON LAW PROHIBITION PREVAILS.

The quintessence of all these holdings is that, when measured by the common law, the saloon business is unlawful, and, therefore, without a legal existence. In other words, in the absence of a statute legalizing the business, common law prohibition prevails.

CAN STATE LICENSE SALOON?

But the question this court has to decide in the case at bar is, can the State, under the guise of a police regulation, looking to the preservation of public morals, license the saloon business?

Counsel for the applicant answers this question, first by asserting that it is the exclusive province of the Legislature to determine what measures are appropriate and needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health and the public safety, and that its determination of the question and the character of the measure can not be inquired into by the courts. That any enactment of the Legislature, as an ostensible exercise of the police power, no matter what may be its character, is absolutely immune from any investigation by the courts. If this proposition be sound, then it follows that the Legislature may license the saloon business even though the effect be to destroy, rather than to protect the public morals, the public health and public safety, and here is the place to punctuate with a period and close the discussion.

This court can not give its assent to this proposition.

In the case of Calder vs. Bull, 3 Dallas, 386, Judge Chase, speaking for the United States Supreme Court, said: "I cannot subscribe to the omnipotence of a State Legislature, or that it is absolute and without control, although its authority should not be expressly restrained by the constitution or fundamental law of the State. The purposes for which we enter into society will determine the nature and ends of the social compact; and as they are the foundation of the Legislative power, they will decide what are the proper objects of it. There are acts which the Federal or State Legislature can not do without exceeding their authority. An Act of the Legislature (for I can not call it a law) contrary to the first great principles of the social compact, can not be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority. The Legislature may enjoin, forbid and punish, and establish rules of conduct for all citizens in future cases; they may command what is right and prohibit what is wrong, but they can not change innocence into guilt." And Judge Chase might have very appropriately added, "they can not change inherent wrong into right."

Again, in the same case, he says: "The genius, the nature, and the spirit, of our State governments amount to a prohibition of such acts of legislation; and the general principles of law and reason forbid them.

To maintain that our Federal or State Legislature possesses such powers, if they had not been expressly restrained, would, in my opinion, be a political heresy, altogether inadmissible in our free republican governments."

The Supreme Court of Indiana in the case of State vs. Gerhardt, 145, 452, on this same question said: "It (the police power) is not, however, without limitation, and it can not be invoked so as to invade the fundamental rights of a citizen. As a general proposition, it may be ascertained that it is the province of the Legislature to decide when the exigency exists for the exercise of this power, but what are the subjects which come within it, is evidently a judicial question."

We have already shown that the courts generally have adjudged the saloon business to be unlawful at common law, because it invades the fundamental rights of citizens. Upon this same question the Supreme Court of Illinois, in the case of Ritchie vs. People, 40 N. E. 454; 29 L. R. A. 29, said: "The Legislature can not so use that power as to invade the fundamental rights of the citizen; and it is for the courts to decide whether a measure, which assumes to have been passed in the interest of public health, really relates to, and is convenient and appropriate to promote, the health."

Some Views on Present Day Topics.

SAVE THE SOCIETY.

BY BENJ. F. WHITSON.

If we would save the Society of Friends, we must first experience salvation ourselves. This experience comes by implicit obedience to the very gentle suggestions of the Spirit of God in our spiritual consciousness. This Spirit leads to repentance and a manner of life that is ever rising and expanding with its growth in grace. It leads, also, to an unreserved surrender, not as by force, but willingly, as having better things in store for us.

He or she who learns thus to obey, looking neither to the right hand or the left, not wasting thought or energy in speculation as to what this one or that one shall do, but ever faithful to the Gleam, will do so in sweet forgetfulness of self. Theirs will be the language of those on the right hand, who said, "Lord, when saw we Thee hungry and fed Thee, or thirsty and gave Thee drink? When saw we Thee a stranger and took Thee in? or naked and clothed Thee? When saw we Thee sick or in prison, and came unto Thee?" And the King shall answer, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me." "Love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, seeketh not her own." Love loseth itself, and, in so doing, is kept by the power of God eternally. Men and women are not saved by saying to themselves, "Let the world go on in wickedness, if it will; I am going to make sure of my salvation." The Society of Friends is not likely to be saved by a band of us saying, "The Society of Friends has a great mission and a great opportunity, we will go to work and advertise it and make it attractive and popular—we will organize First-day schools and reading circles—and temperance societies and leagues of various kinds; we will save the Society. These things are sometimes the outcome of a saving grace at work amongst the members, and, when such is the case, they should not be hampered in their operation—they should be aided and encouraged.

What I mean, is this, spiritual revivals are not a business proposition, though it is possible to foster them or obstruct them in a business-like way. They are the product of individual and collective anxiety of mind for individual and collective righteousness, and this does not come by making a constitution and by-laws, and electing a president, secretary and treasurer.

Growth in grace is not forced in this way.

The forces that make a great noise are mostly destructive forces. The constructive forces work silently and mostly by a process of transmutation—a change of nature, as from the slime of the stagnant pool to the delicate white of the beautiful lily.

Jesus Christ had a great mission, and He accomplished his work. But His biography is expressed in one sentence, "He went about doing good." His life was simply doing things as they came to hand. To Him no circumstance or opportunity was trivial. The stones in the pathway, the flowers by the roadside, the crows in the tree-tops, the farmers in the field, the woman at the mill, the beggar by the gate, afforded opportunities sufficient for His divine work. Need we ask more? Would we save our Society? Would we save ourselves? Would we save others? Then let us give place to the Spirit of God, "letting" that mind be in us which was also in Christ Jesus. In doing this, we shall go our way and do our work in the blest unconsciousness of the wayside flowers that spread their petals to the sun and let their fragrance fill the air. This "letting" the Spirit have free course in us will not cause us all to bloom exactly alike, or to cast exactly the same character of fragrance. There is one beauty of the rose, that blooms amongst thorns, and another beauty of pink.

The fragrance of the violet is different from the sweetness of the mignonette. Some flowers are flashy and grow where all may see them. Some love to hide in unfrequented places and cast their sweetness on the desert air.

The sweet lives of many saintly people are not exposed to public view, but the conspicuous service of other lives should not be condemned because of its seeming flashiness.

"Do thy duty, that is best, Leave unto thy Lord the rest."

"Oh, House of Israel, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord."

The International Lesson.

LESSON XI.

THIRD MONTH 17, 1907.

JACOB AND ESAU.

Genesis 27: 15-23, 41-45.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord, but they that deal truly are his delight. Prov. 12: 22.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Third mo. 11.—The plan to deceive Isaac. Gen. 27: 1-14.
Third-day, Third mo. 12.—Jacob and Esau. Gen. 27: 15-23.
Fourth-day, Third mo. 13.—Jacob blessed. Gen. 27: 24-29.
Fifth-day, Third mo. 14.—Esau weeping. Gen. 27: 30-40.
Sixth-day, Third mo. 15.—Jacob and Esau. Gen. 27: 41-45.
Seventh-day, Third mo. 16.—A warning. Heb. 12: 12-17.
First-day, Third mo. 17.—The Lord hates lying. Prov. 6: 12-19.

Time.—Uncertain; possibly about 1800 years B. C.

Place.—Beersheba, in the southern part of Palestine.

From this time Isaac falls into the background of the narrative and Jacob takes the most prominent place. From the very time of their birth Esau and Jacob were rivals, and it is clear that the author of the narrative intends his readers not only to become acquainted with history, but also to recognize in the twins two different types of human character, afterwards pictured in the Edom and Israel of a later age. "Esau is the type of the 'natural man'—a man of strong animal instincts, free-handed and generous, but undisciplined, unresponsive to spiritual ideas and impulses, and therefore incapable of moral growth. He has none of the faults which mar the character of Jacob, but also has none of his capacity for greatness. Jacob, on the other hand, is a type of 'the spiritual man,' whose higher nature is slowly and painfully developed."

The whole of chapter 27 should be read.

15. "Goodly raiment." His best clothes, not his everyday attire. "Put them upon Jacob." To deceive Isaac.

16. "Kids." The hair of the kids would be soft and more like a man's hair.

17. "The savory meat." Such as Isaac had asked Esau to prepare for him.

18, 19. Isaac evidently was suspicious and asked who it was. The story of this deception shows the relentless truthfulness of the narrative. Though Jacob was one of the heroes of Jewish history, his deception and that of Rebekah are bluntly described. The deception once begun, it was easy to go on and lie with the lips. His mother knew that she could trust Jacob to carry this deception to a conclusion. One lie often leads to another and another. So Isaac, still suspicious, keeps questioning Jacob. "So quickly." It was earlier than he had reason to expect the return of Esau. "Because," etc. Still another lie to support the others.

21. Isaac, perhaps, from knowledge of Jacob's character, still suspects and tries to test the fact by touch. Here the deception is successful, and, in spite of his just questions, his suspicions are lulled, if not dispelled. Isaac's words are pathetic—"The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

23. "So he blessed him." The blessing is given in verses 27-29. Note that Isaac gives a blessing suited to Esau, for it relates almost wholly to worldly prosperity—the eldest son's part lies specially in the words, "Be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee." Compare 2 Sam. 8:14. The fraud was almost at once found out by Esau's return. The account in verses 30-40 is again very pathetic. It may be well to refer to the well-known passage in Hebrews (12:17), which is often misunderstood. The real meaning is Esau found no possibility of undoing his act—selling his birthright—it was done, and done once for all—no amount of sorrow or weeping could undo it. Compare the blessing Isaac did give him with that of Jacob.

41. "The days of mourning for my father are near." It cannot be long before he will die, and until then I will postpone my revenge upon Jacob.

42. "And these words." Probably Esau, in his rage, not only thought, but expressed his thoughts in words which were repeated to Rebekah. "Jacob." Her favorite. There is no mention of how much of his mother's share in the deception was known to Esau. "Doth comfort himself." Is planning to take vengeance on thee and is comforting himself with the thought.

43. "Flee, thou, to Laban, my brother, to Haran." "Laban." See Gen. 24:29; 11:31; Hosea 12:12. "Haran." In Mesopotamia. Compare Gen. 11:31 as above.

44. "Tarry with him a few days." Rebekah thought Jacob's stay in Mesopotamia would be short, but days of twenty-four hours cannot be meant, for Jacob would hardly undertake so long a journey for so short a stay; he could have found safety nearer home. How long Jacob was absent it is impossible to state. The accounts are not consistent—some mistake has crept in somewhere. Verse 2 (Gen. 27) implies that Isaac was almost on his death-bed, and yet, according to Gen. 35:28, he would seem to have survived eighty years (compare 25:26; 26:34); or, by comparing dates given in Jacob's life, forty-three years. The latter would make Jacob seventy-seven years old when he was tending sheep for Laban and seeking a wife. The matter has to be left unsettled.

45. "Then I will send." Though it is not stated so exactly, the inference is pretty clear that Jacob never saw his mother again. "Why should I be bereaved of you both in one day?" If Esau should kill Jacob he would be compelled to fly on account of the custom of "blood-revenge," which was current at that time. See Gen. 9:6; 2 Sam. 14:7. Compare, however, Gen. 27:46—28:5, for a further account of the reason of Jacob's visit to Haran; though Rebekah may not have mentioned her real reasons and have deceived Isaac again.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Rebekah and Jacob were not willing to wait God's time, and suffered in consequence.

2. "Dare to be true: nothing can need a lie. A fault which needs it most, grows two thereby."

—Herbert.

3. The end does not justify the means.

4. A lie is almost sure to act like a boomerang and recoil sooner or later on him who tells it.

TOPIC FOR THIRD MONTH SEVENTEENTH, 1907.

WHAT IS SUCCESS?

Prov. 3:1-18.

Second-day, Third mo. 11.—Success is God's favor. Ps. 12:1-8.
Third-day, Third mo. 12.—Success is character. Ps. 15:1-5.
Fourth-day, Third mo. 13.—Measured at the end. Job 42:10-17.
Fifth-day, Third mo. 14.—The fear of God. Prov. 1:1-9.
Sixth-day, Third mo. 15.—Common sense and religion. Prov. 26:1-10.
Seventh-day, Third mo. 16.—Keeping commandments. Eccl. 8:1-9.

Success is apt to be estimated by the measure of attainment of one's desires. If we get what we want, our first feeling, at least, is that we have succeeded. So if another man gains what seems to us desirable, we may set him down as successful without properly considering all attendant circumstances and results. Lot and his neighbors alike, no doubt, thought he had by far the best of the bargain when he pitched his tents in the well-watered valleys of the Jordan; but it was also "toward Sodom."

One of God's promises to Abraham was, "I am thy reward," and while we are in the Bible class we would all say that to gain such a reward would be the greatest possible achievement, though the test of the other one hundred hours, more or less, of the week's activities might lead a casual observer to doubt our regard for its sufficiency. The sense of His presence would restrain from many things that common usage sanctions; therefore, the casual mind does not like to keep God in remembrance. There is abundant proof of the importance of the weekly hours of worship in this one fact—that the standards of success that are forced upon us in the world are not in harmony with those that God establishes in His words, "My ways are not your ways," and we need them brought often to mind.

How many men, if asked to name the most worthy attainment of life, would answer, Peace? And yet it is perhaps the most wonderful of all of God's promises—that in Him we shall have peace. That surely does not mean Nirvana, loss of all desire and forgetfulness of all that has been. Nor is it the mere sense of the forgiveness of sin and the removal of the fear of personal loss. God's peace is the contentment of mind and spirit that follows on duty faithfully performed, and a glad readiness for whatever may be appointed to us, with minds stayed on Him who promises perfect peace.

Wealth can not buy such peace, and if we may judge from observation, it is rarely accompanied by it. Place and power are not necessarily associated with it, and are often gained and held only by its sacrifice. It is God's gift to those who trust and obey Him. Yet this does not mean that good men can not have wealth nor influence. I believe they have the most reasonable hope for a right and reasonable amount of them of any class of persons in the world. No doubt "the times are out of joint" to an extent that must grieve every lover of righteousness, but it is still true that "God's in His world," and it pays from every point of view to be in harmony with His laws.

The "green bay-tree" of wickedness may flourish for a time as if wrong and not right was the way to success, but the "latter end" is to be counted in. No success that fails there is worthy of the name. Even if we could disregard quality, the element of duration comes in to effect the measure of quantity, and the words of divine wisdom and the experience of life are at one in favor of the man that "walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly."

BUSINESS AND MISSIONS.

BY W. IRVING KELSEY.

A few weeks ago a paragraph appeared in THE AMERICAN FRIEND which has the right ring to it. It stated that the Young Men's Christian Association had started the "Layman's Missionary Movement," the object of which is to promote missions on a purely business basis. This does not necessarily imply that business principles are not used in the carrying on of missions, some of which have the very best business talent at their command, both at home and abroad. Missions are essentially a philanthropic and gratuitous undertaking. Publishing, medical, educational, industrial and church work are carried on with no thought of an adequate money compensation from those benefited. Much effort is being put forth to make these enterprises self-supporting, and more is being accomplished along this line each year. But the natural expansion of the work and the opening up of new fields make an ever increasing demand for support on the home constituency.

Thus it is that any new movement to help solve this great financial question should be hailed with joy. As I understand it, the proposition is to go into the business of money-making in foreign lands, with the purpose of furthering the Master's kingdom. Can such an undertaking prove a success? Can a man do this double work? Most assuredly and emphatically, yes. There are a goodly number of American business and professional men and farmers in Mexico, who are substantially aiding the mission cause, both morally and financially. These are at the same time successful in their several callings. It must be confessed that the great majority of Americans who come here are not animated by any missionary spirit. Many of this latter class are a positive hindrance to the cause of Christ.

The present is a time of great opportunity in Mexico. There are marks of progress on every hand. Excellent business openings present themselves everywhere. Agriculture, stock-raising and fruit-growing offer alluring inducements. The medical profession and dentistry are claiming their share of American ability and enterprise. The business and mining interests are also attracting recruits. Wherever one looks he sees openings for money-making. Why should these opportunities be improved by those who have no interest in the cause of Christ? Why should Friends wait for the Young Men's Christian Association? Our missionaries have been blazing the way here for over thirty years, and a good work has been started. We have a publishing house, schools and churches. The incoming of a number of self-supporting Friends with an interest in the work would greatly strengthen it at the present time. Especially would this be true if a community could be started, which would furnish work for our people, give them an opportunity to acquire small farms of their own, and serve as a center for future operations. By helping people to help themselves we would soon arrive at the long-desired goal of self-support.

Here is an opportunity that requires capital and business ability. We need a new "Volunteer Movement," both in our colleges and out of them, in which shall be enlisted not only ministers and teachers, but farmers, mechanics, professional and business men, who will go out and live the Christ life where their influence will count for the most, and yet where material success is almost sure to crown their efforts.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I feel that I must protest against the view of prayer presented in a recent article in THE AMERICAN FRIEND. Though there is much in the article that commends itself to everyone, it seems to limit the benefits of prayer to the reflex action upon the petitioner, and to consider the idea that prayer has any influence upon God's action as one of the childish notions that are to be put away when we come to spiritual and intellectual manhood. Such a position seems to view the course of human events as the workings of merely automatic machinery that the Maker has left to run itself without any interference on His part. I cannot believe any such teaching. God has, indeed, established certain laws in the material world, and paralleled them in the spiritual world, that we may know what to depend upon, and receive the reward of faithful compliance with those laws, and perceive the danger of neglecting them. But He has not abdicated His throne. He can still "do what He will with His own." He can give His laborers more than the stipulated reward. Love is still supreme, and gives above and beyond all law; not at the mere caprice or short-sighted longings and askings of the creature, but answering their requests according to His infinite wisdom, and in the light of the eternal consequences.

The scientist sits in his laboratory or study, and finds, by experiment or investigation, that certain results always follow certain conditions, and he is right as far as he goes. But there is one element that he cannot experiment with that he is apt to lose sight of, that may, and sometimes does, alter the result materially. It is the direct power of God when He sees fit to exercise it in answer to prayer, not only in bringing peace and spiritual blessings, but also in outward events. There are hundreds of well attested instances of this in modern times, as well as in the miracles recorded in the Scriptures; very many that cannot be explained in any other way than by Divine interposition. For anyone to refuse to believe well-attested facts, coming from many independent sources, is not an evidence of breadth of view, but of narrowness and prejudice. There are facts that cannot be proved or attested by laboratory methods, and yet must be taken into account in arriving at sound conclusions. To adopt a theory as conclusively right, merely because it fits the facts that come under one's own observation and the observation of those using similar methods, and to deny the possibility of results observed by others using a more comprehensive method, is both unfair and unscientific. The really scientific way is to first get all the facts obtainable, and then construct the theory, and to discard any theory that will not fit all the facts. I firmly believe that no theory can be made to fit all the facts that leaves out God as the immediate and personal ruler of the world, able and willing to act as He sees fit, even if, in rare instances, it differs from His ordinary way of working through natural laws. Even these are subject one to another, within their respective limits. Nothing is more sure, reliable and universal in its operation than the law of gravitation, yet the electrician, by the application of the law of electric or magnetic energy may, within certain limits, so overcome the law of gravitation as to apparently suspend its operation. Is it unreasonable to suppose that there may be other laws of still higher and wider powers that may have corresponding predominance when applied by those who have learned the secret? The Scriptures tell us that there is such a law, "the law of faith," and they record numerous instances of its triumphant application. Every generation, from those times to the present, has told of similar instances of wonderful answers to the prayer of faith when offered "according to the will of God." I think that the disbelievers in the existence or efficacy of such a law have not fairly examined its workings, and, therefore, are not competent judges.

Our friend may possibly have "the peace of God" with his view of prayer, but he cannot have the joy of those who are frequently receiving fresh evidences of God's loving interest and help in the practical affairs of life, as well as in the more spiritual matters. Jesus said to his disciples, "Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." To invite a person, "in everything . . . to make his requests known unto God," if there be no possibility of his receiving any but a subjective answer, seems like mockery. Our hearts cry out for a "living God," not mere law; for a loving and responsive Father, not an inflexible ruler. I cannot but believe that the universal longing gives good reason to expect that there is satisfaction to be found somewhere, if rightly sought. We have, above all, Christ's own words, "If ye shall ask anything of the Father, He will give it you in my name;" the name of Him whose whole attitude and desire was, "Not my will, but Thine be done." Those who act upon this promise in simple faith, in submission to God's will and wisdom, find ample reason to rejoice and give thanks for recognized answers. We need to encourage one another to pray more, rather than to discourage prayer by expressing disbelief in its being little more than a healthful spiritual exercise. Prayer and worship, though they coincide in some respects, are far from being identical.

JOHN C. THOMAS.

Baltimore, Second month, 1907.

Things of Interest Among Quakers.

Amos Sanders is now located as pastor in the meeting at Los Angeles, Cal. His address is 237 S. Flower Street.

Maurice Jones, West Milton, Ohio, preached a very acceptable sermon at Chester, Ind., Sabbath morning, the 24th ult.

Rachel C. Woodard and husband will engage in pastoral work the coming spring and summer at Prairie Center, Kas. Their address will be Eudora, Kas., R. R. No. 2.

Isaac Stanley, Bloomingsport, Ind., and Herbert Huffman, Winchester, Ind., acceptably attended services at New West-ville, Ohio, the 24th ult. The pastor, Edward Hartley, was away in evangelistic work.

Rufus M. Jones delivered an address at Twentieth Street Meeting House, New York, on Seventh-day evening, Third month 2d. His subject was "Development of Professional Ministry in the Early Church." He also attended New York City Meeting on First-day.

Many of our readers, especially those who are members of the New England Yearly Meeting, will regret to learn of the death of John Jones, China, Maine. He has for many years taken a very important part in the religious work of his neighborhood, and he has been a pillar in the China Meeting.

Friends at Langley, Wash., have organized a meeting. There are few in number, but eight new members have been added since they started. The First-day morning services are well attended, and the evening services even better. The Bible school is also thriving.

The Friends at Stafford, Kas., recently enjoyed a series of meetings, which continued one week, conducted by the local minister, A. J. Bond, and the quarterly meeting superintendent, M. F. Swofford. Eight professed conversion and some will unite with the meeting.

New Garden Quarterly Meeting was held Seventh-day and First-day, the 23d and 24th ult. Several ministers from other places were present. Ira C. Johnson, the yearly meeting superintendent of evangelistic work, and Daisy Barr, Fairmount, preached acceptably on Seventh-day, and President Robert L. Kelly, Earlham College, on Sabbath. Friends were exhorted to "walk softly before the Lord," as becometh His servants, and also to seek out and develop gifts in the Church.

After the Biblical Institute, which was held at Friends' University, Wichita, Kas., a series of meetings was held under the leadership of Alfred T. Ware. The meetings were held for a week and a decided interest was manifest on the part of the students of the University and others. The work was strong, deep and spiritual. A good number of young persons came out definitely for the Christian life, and many who already were professing Christians received a deeper experience in spiritual life.

Pres. Edwin H. McGrew writes from Newberg, Ore.:—"We are now having what I regard the greatest meetings we have ever had in our meeting, and we have had about all kinds. Charles Replogle is with us, and is leading the nearest Quaker revival I have ever known. He is preaching a most precious Gospel, quietly and powerfully. There is no outward demonstration in the meeting save a manifestation of most deep and tender feeling. Friends speak to one another in quiet tones, pray softly, but feelingly, speak in testimony calmly, but full of assurance. It is most refreshing, and I believe there is a work going on all unseen, that is most marvellous, and which will last through eternity."

C. H. Parkhurst, the well-known minister and social purity worker, New York City, recently preached a sermon, in which he severely condemned the excessive military demonstrations proposed for the Jamestown Exposition. We quote some of his words: "It is gratifying to be informed that the Administration is not back of it, and that the appropriation made in its behalf by Congress was secured by chicanery; but it will exert its militarizing effect, notwithstanding; it will have the appearance of being a national kick at Christianity, a square affront put upon all that was most distinctive of the teaching and spirit of Christ, and will firmly root in the minds of people all the way from the Atlantic eastward and out into China, India and Japan, the conviction that with all the honey-tongued missionaries that America sends out to gospelize the Orient, what America really believes in at heart is not love and peace, but blood and the enginery of slaughter."

A. W. Macy sends us a few words in further explanation of the recent changes in Chicago Quarterly Meeting. He says, in part, "It is true, as stated, that the meeting at Western Springs, with a membership of about 48, has been discontinued, and that a new monthly meeting has been established on the West Side, in Chicago, with a "charter membership" of about 30. It is also true that there is a church building at Western Springs, and none on the West Side. It should be stated further, however, that a large percentage of the membership at Western Springs is non-resident, and that a large majority of these non-resident members are nearer the West Side meeting than they are to Western Springs. Furthermore, the meeting house at Western Springs is not the property of Friends. Western Springs is one of the prettiest suburbs of Chicago, with a population of about 1,000, and heretofore with a church to each 200 people. The Friends' meeting was established there about twenty-two years ago, with the expectation that Friends coming to Chicago to live would take up their residence here. This expectation has not been realized, except to a very limited degree."

Kokomo Quarterly Meeting was held in Kokomo, Ind., the 22d and 23d ult., and was a time of great blessing. On sixth-day, Gurney Dix, minister from Fairmount Meeting, Ind., was favored of the Lord in preaching an impressive sermon on some of the principles underlying right action. He showed that the members of the meeting on ministry and oversight must live and act from principle if they would win people to Christ, and maintain Quaker standing.

Richard Haworth, pastor in the Union Street Meeting, in Kokomo, gave an address on "The Pastoral Movement in the Friends' Church." He drew a parallel between the early Jewish history and that of Friends, and presented the subject in such a manner as to create a great interest in the subject; so much that the meeting unanimously asked him to write the address in full, and read it at the next quarterly meeting on ministry and oversight, and have it freely discussed.

Gurney Dix preached again on Seventh-day, a strong sermon, and James Ellis, now eighty-two years old, preached on First-day. All seemed greatly blessed, and highly pleased with the quarterly meeting.

James Ellis preached with as much fervor and vigor as a young man, and his message was well received by the congregation.

The quarterly meeting is only held, at Kokomo, once a year. The next session will be held at New Hope.

A number of our readers will be interested in reading the little sketch concerning "Woodbrooke," which recently appeared in the London Friend:

"All through the history of the Society, Friends have been found willing to give up business and the making of money so that they might be able to do work for the Lord. The Wardens of Woodbrooke have been examples of this. The first Wardens were Joshua and Isabella A. Rowntree; the former was a member of some thirteen public bodies or committees in Scarborough, and at much self-sacrifice took the office. They were followed by William and Margaret Littleboy, who, for two and a-half years have, at no small sacrifice, consecrated themselves to the work, but they have found the strain too great to continue in the office beyond the spring term.

"Now we understand that Isaac and Mary Snowden Braithwaite are willing to take the office for the summer term, and if they have a clear sense that it is the Divine will, and health is granted them, they may be willing to continue to occupy it for a further period. Isaac Braithwaite, like the predecessors mentioned, is a busy man, and one of the most esteemed citizens of Kendal, taking part in almost everything that concerns the interests of the town. He is a student, and will be able thoroughly to enter into the studies of the residents. Mary Snowden Braithwaite needs no introduction. We can but believe that her joyful, happy spirit will permeate the establishment, and there can be no doubt that the knowledge in America that a member of the much beloved "Thomas" family will be there, will draw many from that country. Every term there have been American Friends at Woodbrooke; last term there were four, the term previous to that there were five; they have belonged to the various bodies into which Friends are divided in the United States. When thus brought together with the desire to know more of the Lord, the little differences that have separated them in the United States have apparently vanished. One of the most interesting features of Woodbrooke has been the bringing together of Friends of various schools of thought from this country as well as America.

"Next week we shall give an illustration of the new Holland House, which has just been built and presented by George and Elsie Cadbury as a further gift to Woodbrooke. It contains twelve separate student's cubicles, each fitted up with heating apparatus, desk for study, bed, etc., and a common sitting-room. It is on the site of the little cottage which was called Holland House, by the first Warden, Joshua Rowntree, in reference to the presence of Dutch students. There is also accommodation for the Warden or one of the teachers, consisting of two sitting-rooms, four bed-rooms, kitchen, etc. Even with this increased accommodation, we would advise those who are wishful to come during the summer term to make early application. The terms are £16 per term, and there are a considerable number of scholarships at the value of £10 for students in this country, also scholarships for American students."

Notwithstanding the unwillingness of Germany, France and Russia to discuss the subject of disarmament and the limitation of armaments at the coming Hague conference, it now seems quite probable that such will be the case, since recent happenings indicate that Great Britain and the United States will insist upon it, and it is not unlikely that some definite steps will be taken by the conference toward disarmament. A recent bill in the English Parliament makes provision for limiting battle-ship construction "to conform to a possible action of the coming congress of the powers on the subject of disarmament and the limitation of armaments." This stands in happy contrast to the recent action of our own Congress in voting appropriations for more battle-ships.

For several weeks the Government has been examining bids from large contractors for digging the Panama Canal. A great amount of time has been spent over the details of such an arrangement, and considerable feeling has developed among some of the ambitious contractors, and the final outcome of the whole matter has been the rejection of all bids. Last week the administration completely changed its plans, deciding to let Army engineers supervise the work. This puts the general management of the canal work under Government officials, but allows contractors to bid on specific jobs. The recently appointed engineer, John F. Stevens, has resigned, and three Army engineers, George W. Goethals, David D. Gaillard, and William L. Sibert have been despatched to Panama.

A DIFFERENCE.

IT PAID THIS MAN TO CHANGE FOOD.

"What is called 'good living' eventually brought me to a condition quite the reverse of good health," writes a New York merchant.

"Improper eating told on me till my stomach became so weak that food nauseated me, even the lightest and simplest lunch, and I was much depressed after a night of uneasy slumber, unfitting me for business.

"This condition was discouraging, as I could find no way to improve it. Then I saw the advertisement of Grape-Nuts food, and decided to try it, and became delighted with the result.

"For the past three years I have used Grape-nuts and nothing else for my breakfast, and for lunch before retiring. It speedily set my stomach right, and I congratulate myself that I have regained my health. There is no greater comfort for a tired man than a lunch of Grape-Nuts. It insures restful sleep, and an awakening in the morning with a feeling of buoyant courage and hopefulness.

"Grape-Nuts has been a boon to my whole family. It has made of our two-year-old boy, who used to be unable to digest much of anything, a robust, healthy little rascal weighing 32 pounds. Mankind certainly owes a debt of gratitude to the expert who invented this perfect food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

son learning some useful occupation, and learning it well, is forcibly brought to our attention from time to time by the scarcity of professional laborers. A good story is told by Henry Walters, head of the Atlantic Coast Lines. He was recently making an investigation of his lines, and found six locomotives steamed up, ready to start, at one round-house, without a single engineer in sight. He asked the foreman why the locomotives were not starting out, and was informed that the six engineers who were to have taken the engines had reported sick that morning. Somewhat surprised at this, Walters asked:

"But are they really sick?"

"No," was the reply. "They have all gone to the fair, and just reported sick."

"Why, then, don't you discharge them?" was Walters' rejoinder.

"Because," the foreman replied, "I cannot get six other men under the sun to take their places, and these men know it."

If Henry Walters made any suggestion that would get around the difficulty thus tersely put, it was not repeated as part of the story.

A recent bill introduced in the New York Assembly calling for the appointment of a commission to investigate the matter of abandoned farms and the depopulation of the rural districts of the State calls attention to a very interesting situation. The balance of population has been shifting for many years from the country to the cities and larger towns. In fact, this movement has gone so far that New York is no longer an agricultural State, either in the extent of acreage under cultivation, the value or volume of products, in relative capital invested, or in the relative number of persons employed. The main cause of this is the lure of the towns. The opportunity for higher wages and fewer hours of work of a less laborious nature and the promises involved in the larger contact with life in the shops of the towns, not only drew the younger generations from the farms, but prevented labor from going to them. Inability to work the farms to their full capacity and the small profit on crops produced made the result inevitable. The acreage of cultivation was diminished yearly until the stage was reached when not a farm in New York, outside of a garden market district, could be sold for a price which is based on its productive capacity.

DAWNLIGHT ON THE HEIGHTS.

The lonely peaks of mountains catch the glow,

When day's bright king first paints the orient,

And to the darksome, misty valleys throw

The rosy light which he to them has lent.

E'en thus do martyr-souls serene and high,

Catch the first beam the sun of Progress sends,

And flash it where life's darkling valleys lie,

And ignorance her way in sorrow wends.

COFFEE THRESHED HER

FIFTEEN LONG YEARS.

"For over fifteen years," writes a patient, hopeful, little Illinois woman, "while a coffee drinker I suffered from spinal irritation and nervous trouble. I was treated by good physicians, but did not get much relief.

"I never suspected that coffee might be aggravating my condition. I was down-hearted and discouraged, but prayed daily that I might find something to help me.

"Several years ago, while at a friend's house, I drank a cup of Postum, and thought I had never tasted anything more delicious.

"From that time on I used Postum instead of coffee, and soon began to improve in health, so that now I can walk half a dozen blocks or more with ease, and do many other things that I never thought I would be able to do again in this world.

"My appetite is good, I sleep well, and find life is worth living, indeed. A lady of my acquaintance said she did not like Postum, it was so weak and tasteless.

"I explained to her the difference when it is made right—boiled according to directions. She was glad to know this, because coffee did not agree with her. Now her folks say they expect to use Postum the rest of their lives." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

GROWING OLD.

It is not that our spirits shrink
Because we near the river's brink
That rolls along the plain,
And feel the breaking link by link
Of love's earth binding chain.

We know each link that's severed here
Strengthens the chain that draws us where

Sad partings never come,
And past are every pain and fear
In God's eternal home.

And if to feet grown weak and old
Death's turbid waters feel too cold,
We know they'll soon be past,
And in the warm and sheltered fold
We shall be safe at last.

But, O, to feel the weakening hand,
The brain grow slow to understand,
The daily waning sight
Of eyes that once the distant scanned
And faced the noontide light.

To mark the weary, stumbling feet
That once were strong and sure and fleet,

The quickly deafening ear,
The heart's slow pulses feebly beat,
The spirit faint with care.

To feel the failing hour by hour
Of every high God-given power
In which we took such pride,
And know that life's rich, precious dower

Must soon be laid aside.

But let us not, old friends, forget
There is a dower more precious yet
Whose glory will not fade,
The life renewed when death's stern debt

Hath been forever paid.

In realms we'll find once more
Each power returned in tenfold store
Never to pass away,
And there, all pain and weakness o'er,
We'll work through God's long day.

Jim Jackson was brought before a Western judge charged with chicken stealing. After the evidence was all in, the justice, with a perplexed look, said: "But I do not understand, Jackson, how it was possible for you to steal those chickens when they were roosting right under the owner's window, and there were two vicious dogs in the yard." "Hit wouldn't do yer a bit o' good, jedge, for me to 'splain how I kotched dem chickens, fer you couldn't do hit yerself ef yer tried it fohty times, an' yer might git yer hide full er lead. De bes' way fer you ter do, jedge, is jes ter buy yo' chickens in de market, same ez odder folks does, and when yer wants to commit any rascality, do hit on de bench, whar yo' is at home."—Exchange.

LOSS AND GAIN.

When I compare
What I have lost with what I have gained,
What I have missed, with what attained,
Little room do I find for pride.

I am aware
How many days have been idly spent,
How like an arrow, the good intent
Has fallen short or turned aside.

But who shall dare
To measure loss and gain in this wise?
Defeat may be victory in disguise;
The lowest ebb is the turn of the tide.

age. Remnants of walls, and of monochrome decorated earthen ware were found, as well as a number of elaborately ornamented vases.

The new Russian Douma spent most of its time last week perfecting its organization. Feodor Golovin, from Moscow, was elected president. He belongs to the Constitutional Democrats, one of the moderate parties. The other officers were selected from the Radical elements, and, on the whole, the Douma seems to be in their control. It is to be hoped that they have learned something by past experience, and will exercise moderation in attempting to carry their schemes into effect.

It is reported that the sultan of Turkey has prohibited the removal from his dominions of all archæological treasures and antiquities. The decree, if persisted in, puts an end to all the great exploring enterprises of Americans, Germans and English on the ancient sites of Babylon and Nineveh. Had it been made earlier and been enforced, all the wealth of historic knowledge which has been gained since Layard's time would have slumbered still in that ignorance which belongs to that decrepit anachronism, the Mussulman monarchy.

The original manuscript of "Hiawatha," written in pencil by Henry W. Longfellow fifty-two years ago, was recently exhibited in New York. It is, with one exception, the most highly prized of the Longfellow manuscripts extant, the exception being "Evangeline." This original draft of "Hiawatha" consists of between 350 and 400 sheets, octavo size, closely written in the well-known hand of the poet. The pages are bound in tooled leather. They are excellently preserved, and look as though they were written only a few months ago instead of more than half a century.

One of the most interesting recent experiments with radio-telegraphy is the transmission of music. The feat was accomplished by Dr. Lee DeForest. Electric waves were transmitted from the Tel-Harmonic Hall to the Times building, in New York City. Dr. DeForest has contrived an apparatus which can be placed over the ear much like a telephone receiver, and the sounds are reproduced quite as accurately as in an ordinary telephone. The work of perfecting the invention will be carried forward this summer, and it is not unlikely that we will be able to do long distance telephoning by means of radio-telegraphy before many years.

It is gratifying to know that the differences between the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and its trainmen, over the question of increased wages and shorter hours, have been adjusted without a strike. It is a favorable comment on the growing sanity of workingmen and their employers. During the past two years the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. have made a number of concessions to those in its employ with a view of avoiding differences. And the laboring men, on the other hand, have made a number of concessions, which show that they are ready to respond to fair treatment.

FOOD POISONS.

90 PER CENT. OF ALL DISEASES THE RESULT OF UNDIGESTED PUTREFYING FOODS.

Men of affairs, women of society and children with active brains are too often sedentary in their habits, giving little time to exercise. To this evil is added that of high and irregular living—as a result, the stomach cannot stand the demands made upon it. The abused and overtaxed stomach does not properly do the work of digestion, food taken in ferments and the poison permeates the whole system. The body loses in weight and becomes a prey for the attack of whatever disease it may encounter.

Did it ever occur to you how busy that stomach of yours is? It only holds three pints, but in one year you force it to take in 2,400 pounds of material, digest it and prepare it for assimilation into the blood. No wonder it rebels when overworked. We crowd it with steaks and pastry, irritate its juices with spices and acids, and expect the stomach to do its work. It can't do it.

All over the inner layer of the stomach are glands which secrete the juices necessary to digestion. The entrance of food into the stomach is the signal for these glands to do their work. The more the food, and the more indigestible, the greater the demand upon them and upon the muscles of the wall adjoining.

Think of the tons of high-seasoned game, sweetmeats and appetizers crammed into this little four-ounce mill, and then wonder, if you will, why you are dizzy or nauseated or constipated. Don't blame your stomach or curse your fate that you should be born so unfortunate. Blame yourself and apply the remedy.

First, get a small package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, taking one after each meal and at bed time. They are not a medicine, but a digestive. Your stomach is worn out and needs help, not medicine. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will do the work that the stomach fails to do. There's enough power in one grain of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets to digest 3,000 grains of ordinary food, so you needn't fear that anything you eat will remain in your stomach undigested.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will rout the poison because they remove the cause—food fermentation. They are nature's own cure for dyspepsia. The host of troubles dyspepsia is father of cannot be numbered, for a healthy stomach is the source of all health.

Seize your opportunity before worse conditions confront you. Send to-day for a free trial package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. They will bring your stomach relief. F. A. Stuart Co., 83 Stuart Building, Marshall, Mich.

DOES OUR RELIGION MAKE ANY DIFFERENCE?

The worst criticism that can be made of a man's religion is that "it does not make any real difference in his life." It seems to me," says Prof. William James, in substance, "an incredible proposition that no concrete particular of life should be made different by a man's religious belief." And yet there are persons all about us who could change their religion over night without having anybody discover the difference in their lives next day. The trouble is that such persons carry their religion very much like baggage. It is something "taken on" and always remains outside like a turtle's shell, instead of being inside as the source and spring of all moral and spiritual activity.

A little London girl, in a school essay, recently, said: "The only place in the city where you can see wild beasts is in the Theological Garden." The little girl slipped up on her word, but she hit too near the truth. There are too many "theological gardens" that still contain wild beasts. We have not got all the snarl and growl out of our theology. There is still a good deal of the feeling left that a religious system is weak unless it is well supplied with teeth. This spirit of the wild beast in theological controversy is one of the instances where a "system" is "held" without any corresponding transformation of the life. The man is so absorbed in his "views" that he neglects to gain the spirit of life which would justify and verify the "views." His religion has made a "difference" with his "views," but it has not made any real "difference" with his life and spirit. A very ignorant city-child, whose mother had just received a new religious experience, said to her teacher: "I don't know what's happened to mother. She seems to have got a new inside!" That is it. The woman had got a new inside, and that produced a new outside. Her religion made a "difference" and the child felt it. The simple people of the primitive days felt that way about the disciples. "They took note that they had been with Jesus." They had done more than get views; they got a new spirit which made everybody take note of them that something had happened.

The man who stands guard over the masses of immigrants pouring in at Ellis Island, recently, said to a visitor there: "This is a splendid work I have to do, to care for these poor people, and the best of it all is that they cannot even thank me." There is a religion that makes a difference. Contrast him with the ordinary "official" for whom immigrants are nothing but human atoms. You know at once that something has come into that commissioner's spirit that has made it like the spirit of the Galilean, something infinitely better than a theology which makes its owner hostile to his human fellows.

Our strenuous President, in his Harvard address the other day, told the students that "the religious man who is most useful is not he whose sole care is to save his own soul, but the man whose religion bids him strive to advance clean living and to make the world a better place for his fellows to live in." That is a religion that makes a difference, and it is the supreme need of our time to have men and women in our towns and cities who exhibit the kind of religion that makes a difference.

R. M. J.

THE METHOD OF LOVE.

Often after a prolonged struggle for reform which ends in apparent defeat there comes a disposition to abandon the fight or resort to violence, but such is not the method of love. Centuries ago the great prophet of the exile grasped the force of the true method and clothed it in vivid language. He saw the servant of Jehovah with his face set like a flint, steadfast and patient. He likened him to a flail with teeth, mighty in preparing a road for advance. And yet, on the other hand, this servant is gentle and kind. A broken reed will he not disturb, and a low-burning candle will he not quench. In the midst of persecution he is calm and resolute, and, as a sheep in the hands of the shearers he will go, if need be, to a martyr's death without a word of complaint. How perfectly our Divine Master fulfilled this method, and yet how imperfectly has it been carried out in Church and State.

Not a few of us who may possess many Christian virtues have need to learn more perfectly the method of love. In spite of our efforts and prayers to down the liquor traffic, the saloon continues to thrive and we are prone to "take a hatchet and smash" the bottles and glasses or chop the heads out of the kegs and barrels. Or, we may vote for good men year after year, only to see the other candidates elected. Such things have a tendency to dampen our enthusiasm, for right seems

"Forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne."

And we sometimes try to make ourselves believe that good men should retire from the struggle. This should not be. Neither violence nor despair belong to the method of love.

But these are not the only occasions which call for this method. Often in a meeting or on a committee there are those who seem to hinder the cause by refusing to subscribe to the plans and opinions which we believe should prevail, and we are tempted to rule them out or quit. Now, it is not the part of a true disciple to acquiesce in anything which appears to be wrong, or neglect a single opportunity to advance the truth as he sees it, but, at all times, he should respect the honest opinions of those who disagree with him, and his mind should ever be open to greater light. The very occasions which afford opportunity for friction, or ill-feeling, should be the occasions which foster the highest Christian virtues.

The method of love requires our constant effort and our best thought, not as things final or infallible, but as contributions to the great world movement. We should do everything in our power to promote the cause of Truth, granting to our brothers who differ from us the same privileges we approve for ourselves.

To do less is to neglect a duty, to do more is to miss the real meaning of the message of the Master, for, after all, the end to be attained is not the establishment of our opinions and our plans, but that justice may prevail in society, and love abound in the life.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

We do not want to enter in any way into the controversy over R. J. Campbell's views, but we do want to stamp our approval on the noble words of R. F. Horton, the famous Congregational minister. He is one of the wisest leaders in the Church, and his spirit on this matter is the right one. The passage quoted is from the London Daily News, which is owned by our Friend, George Cadbury:

If Mr. Campbell is wrong, free ventilation of his views, brotherly sympathy with him, and affectionate prayer for him will bring him right. If he is right, if he is coming like Amos from the fields and the herds, untrammelled with the theology of the schools, to speak the new truth which Christendom is failing and fainting for, what more terrible mistake could Christian men make than to discourage, wound, and perhaps kill, this man of God, as the Pharisees killed our Lord?

One thing is clear to me. Mr. Campbell gets the ear of that large class of thoughtful and educated English people who do not go to church or hear preaching. These unsatisfied souls recognize in him an original teacher, who is making the Christian Gospel credible to this age. If I were able to help these men and women—if I could honestly say that I meet their needs, and draw them to my church—I should feel justified in criticising my friend. But when I see that he is doing what I cannot do, reaching those whom I cannot reach, and bringing to Christ hundreds who will not listen to me, I can only pray God to bless him, and suspend my judgment in all humility upon the novel statement of the old truths until I have had time to examine and test it.

I deprecate with all my soul not only the clamor against Mr. Campbell, but the party spirit and theological sectarianism which would throw us into two hostile camps—the Old Theology and the New. While nothing is harder than to reach truth in the shadowy spiritual realm, into which only fools rush with hasty confidence and dogmatism, nothing is easier than to make parties and schisms, and to excite the ignorant fanaticism of narrow minds. That is the worst and most fatal heresy of all.

We want to call the attention of all our readers to the Educational Bureau which has been established by the Educational Board of the Five Years' Meeting. The particulars are given in the advertisement, which appears in another column. This is a very valuable undertaking, and it ought to prove a real assistance, both to teachers seeking positions and to institutions in need of teachers.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

PALESTINE AND THE WORK OF FRIENDS.

BY ROSA E. LEE.

"Does it not seem strange that missionaries have to be sent to the very country where Christianity had its birth?" is a question often asked one who has just returned from the land of the Bible.

The majority of people in the homeland know something of Palestine, but they do not stop to think that most of their knowledge is confined to Biblical history.

In order to understand the conditions of the people there to-day and to appreciate what Friends are doing for them, it is necessary to have a short outline of what has happened to the country in the last two thousand years.

The Jewish persecution arose in the time of the apostles, and before the Bible history closes we find the center of Christian activity moving westward, and at a very early date the church sent missionary contributions back to Jerusalem (Acts 24:17; I Cor. 16:1-3; Rom. 15:26).

Syria, which includes Palestine, is so situated that it connects three continents, Europe, Asia and Africa. With the desert on one side and the sea on the other, we find a narrow strip of inhabited land, which has been called the "Bridge of the World."

Because of this position, it has always been a battle-ground of the nations. One writer has said, "Palestine has been but a door-mat on which the conquerors have wiped their feet."

A glance at the annals of the country shows us that from

A. D. 38 to 66—Palestine, under Roman governors, had a time of turmoil. The Jews persecuted the Christians. The land was overrun by robbers and assassins, many with professed religious motives;

A. D. 138—Emperor Hadrian rebuilt Jerusalem as a Roman city and placed a heathen temple on Mt. Moriah.

From A. D. 150 to 330—Roman emperors were friendly to the Jews and persecuted the Christians.

A. D. 330—The mother of Constantine visited Palestine, made a search for sacred places, built a church over the place of nativity at Bethlehem, and also one in Jerusalem over what was thought to be the place where Christ was buried. These, with various additions, stand to-day as the oldest Christian churches in existence.

THE HINNOM VALLEY, NEAR JERUSALEM.

Showing the city walls on Mt. Zion to the right and the modern city in the background. The road in front leads from the railroad station to the Jaffa gate.

finally the hatred between the Jews and Gentiles culminated in war, A. D. 66.

A. D. 70—Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus. The Christians fled. Many Jews were killed and others scattered over the world.

From A. D. 70 to 125—The Christian church grew in the West and the Jews in Palestine seemed to flourish.

A. D. 135—Palestine, under Bar Cochba, attempted to throw off the Roman yoke. They were defeated and the whole of Judea was made like a desert; 985 towns and villages burned, and 50 fortresses destroyed.

A. D. 614.—The country was conquered by the Persian king, Chosroes.

A. D. 628—Restored to the Emperor Heraclius.

A. D. 637—Fell into the hands of the Mohammedans from Arabia, under Calif Omar, who had the large mosque built which now bears his name and stands on the site of Solomon's Temple.

A. D. 1077—Passed under the rule of Seljuk Turks, who persecuted the Pilgrims visiting the sacred places, and thus brought on the crusades.

A. D. 1099 to 1244—The land was held as a Christian Kingdom, under the crusaders.

The ruins of many churches and a few children with fair skin, blue eyes and light hair remain to-day as evidences of this two hundred years' occupancy of foreigners from western Europe.

A. D. 1244—The country was conquered by Ottoman Turks.

A. D. 1382—Palestine was captured by the Mamelukes.

A. D. 1517—Recovered by Sultan Selim, whose son, Soliman, built the wall which at present encloses the old part of the city of Jerusalem.

Since then other conquerors have tried to add Palestine to their conquests, but have failed, and she still remains under the hand of a despot, the Sultan of Turkey, who resides in Constantinople. Under this government, the people have been kept in a state of poverty, ignorance and superstition.

The poverty is brought about by heavy taxes, sickness and the absence of modern improvements. A man's crops, whether grain or fruits, must be divided with the soldiers, who often demand more than the government asks, because they, also, must make their living. A tax of $2.00 per year is paid on every boy from the time he is enrolled, which is soon after his birth. A Syrian must buy the privilege to travel in or to leave his own country. Sickness is often caused by the unsanitary conditions of the home and a lack of knowledge in nursing. The wheat is sown by the hand, gathered with the reap-hook, tramped out by the cows, and ground in a hand-mill. Wool is twisted by hand and woven in an old-fashioned loom.

Ignorance and superstition abound everywhere, and especially in the villages. This is due to the absence of schools and to the presence of false religious teaching.

In Palestine women have been kept as the slaves and toys of their husbands, who, as their master, could divorce them and marry again when they pleased. This has often been done when the wife bore only girls. The parents made the arrangements as to whom their daughters should marry, and stated the amount of money to be paid for them. They did not consult the wishes of the children, for often the little girl would be only eleven or twelve years old when taken from her home and placed under the control of her mother-in-law to work for her and her son. Thus robbed of home and childhood, she began her life of drudgery.

But there is a brighter side to the picture. The land, which, at the close of the dry season, looks so barren and desolate, is, on the contrary, very fertile. As soon as the winter rains come the soft limestone turns to soil and vegetation takes on new life. It has been stated, by men who should know, that, under proper management, Palestine could easily support ten times the population there now. With the same climate and many of the same physical features of lower California, it could be made as beautiful as that land of fruits and flowers.

The native Syrians are quick and intelligent, and yield readily to European influences and to Christian education.

The customs, beliefs and lives of the people are slowly but surely changing.

The Light of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, which shone first in Palestine, was driven out by storm and tempest with only a dim ray left behind, and this was almost blotted out by theological disputes and later covered up with the forms and ceremonies of the Eastern church. But this Light was not extinguished; it was only driven to foreign shores, and here it has proven such a help and blessing in the forming of our nations and in the welfare and happiness of our people that now, after many years, we are carrying it back again to the country that gave it birth.

DECLARING HIS NAME.

BY D. R.

The three children were playing in the large, sunny living-room. Business and household duties occupied the grown-ups of the family, and the children grew large in their lone enjoyment of that big room. Alice and Ruth were at the real work of life, making and fitting doll clothes. Flossy was not old enough to use the needle, but she could mother and squeeze her pet kitten, Midge, and she could also spell out wonderful words and some sentences with her picture-blocks. They were religious children, orthodoxically so. In fact, the great living-room in which they played wore a seriously orthodox air. There was Quaker plainness and rather severe dignity in the furnishings and arrangement, and something made you feel on entering the room that you did want to change things a bit to ease and please the eye: Just turn that table 'round or place a chair at a different angle, or push some other piece of furniture into a careless or rather an unconscious attitude. Every piece seemed to be consciously and properly the preserver of fixed rules of arrangement. But you were quite sure you had better not do so, for habit was so thoroughly marked that chairs might not be recognized as chairs save in their respective places. Doctrinal and religious books abounded on the book-shelves and religious periodicals piled up on the center-table. Religious controversy and discussion, as well as exhortation and prayer, were common to that room, and it was natural that the conversation and plays of the children should savor of the same. "Flossy, do you love J-e-s-u-s?" asked Ruth of her baby-sister. Flossy lifted her large, mild-brown eyes from her pet blocks with a look of some uncertainty at first, but which quickly settled into certainty and answered, "No." "Oh, Flossy, it's wicked not to love J-e-s-u-s! Now, don't you love J-e-s-u-s?" But Flossy was honest and knew that she did not love things which she did not know, so again she sweetly said, "No," though she felt herself under the ban of a prevailing judgment. As the older girls remonstrated and warned, the door opened and Ruth, thirsting for greater victory, spoke up in tones that were supposed to add force to her words, "Oh, Aunt Kate, Flossy says she don't love Jesus." With smiles and a cheery interest in their play, Aunt Kate dropped down by them and asked, "Doesn't my Flossy love Jesus?" Quickly, the little heart looked out of the brown eyes and the little lips proudly said, "Yes, I love Jesus." Ruth's superior ability in spelling had completely hidden the meaning and the sound of the name to the little mind less world-wise than her own. And I was reminded of the select meetings, the committees, and the people in authority "who feel themselves equal to preparing lists of doctrinal questions, which shall cover the whole ground of religious truth, and which are declared to be essential to a living faith in Christ, and further find themselves able to pronounce sentence on all who cannot subscribe to such list as the finished truths, declaring them unsound in the faith of Christ and unfit in experience to lead other men into the knowledge of God. Much of our religious orthodoxy spells the name of Jesus so dogmatically and so confusedly that Christ Himself, in His beauty, in His living, comforting, saving power is not recognized therein. Brethren, it is not the doctrines of the atonement, resurrection, sanctification, miracles, nor second coming which the world needs to have spelled out to it first. But the world and many, very many, church members do need to see and feel quickly the touch of the Son of God. The world has destroyed itself and longs for a present saving power. Church members have said their prayers and gone the round of their duties in an insecure confidence which no less needs the quickening, living sense of Christ in you. After all, life is the thing to live for, and real life is found in union with and faith in the living God. Jesus said, "I have declared Thy name unto them." If His disciples, it is ours to declare God's name and what He is like to men. How did Jesus do it? Not by spelling out a list of doctrines which men must subscribe to. One thing He asked of all, that they believe that God had sent Him, that God loved them as their Father, and that they bring all their lives into the light and under the power of this confidence. And such as did this should know themselves made sons of God.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

AN UNPUBLISHED REMINISCENCE OF CAROLINE E. TALBOT.

BY M. T. WILLIS.

Having heard frequent expressions of disappointment that the letters and diary of our dear friend, Caroline E. Talbot, were destroyed in the burning of her home, I have been asked to send the following sketch for publication, trusting that a fresh lesson of Abrahamic faith may be revealed to its readers, strong in its quality and effective in its results:

This dear Friend, having as she thought, completed a religious service for which she had been liberated, was turning her face homeward, when, during the night-watches, she saw a locality before unknown and felt the Divine call to find the place and, if possible, to hold a meeting. This extra journey would take her away from her home route and, remembering she had no extra money, her only thought was to borrow and return the same. Venturing to the room of her hostess, and asking if she might enter, the feasibility of reaching the place in time for an evening meeting was discussed. Her host, entering heartily into her concern, suggested sending a messenger in advance to make needful arrangements, he and his wife taking her by an evening train.

At that moment a married son, living near by, entered the room, drawn thither by seeing a light in his parents' room and, fearing some one might be ill, had come to inquire. The father at once suggested that this son should take a train nearly due to the town in question, find a suitable building, have circulars printed and distributed, and make all things ready. This was accomplished with some difficulty. In the distribution of the notices, one was handed to a man, who, in a season of sore dejection and discouragement had left his home with the one thought of ending his life, but, observing that a woman would preach that evening, he decided that he would first hear what she might say.

The novelty of a woman-preacher brought together a large audience, several officials of different churches being present. Caroline Talbot chose a text of Scripture and, after speaking a few minutes upon it, she looked around and said, "There is some one present who is contemplating taking his life," and, addressing herself to him, she warned and entreated until the purpose of his life was changed. Then, taking up her subject where she had dropped it, the service was concluded to the peace of her own mind. The young man addressed at once rose to his feet, saying, "I am the one the sister has been speaking to and have the implements of death in my pocket." He then told his story, his discouragements, the hard things that had been heaped upon him, and so forth, but that he now saw the better way and that life looked changed. Then rose another in the audience, confessing that he was in part to blame for the condition the brother was in, that he had said hard things, censuring, instead of pitying. Others followed, ministers confessing their failures and lack of brotherly love toward each other, and a season of genuine fellowship followed.

Before leaving the house, a sweet-faced boy came up to Caroline Talbot with a sealed envelope from his mother, and this was found to contain just the amount of money to take her to her home.

The above was narrated to Caroline E. Talbot by the writer with the query whether it was all correct. She answered, emphatically, "Yes, but that is not all." Then she added, "After this I felt it laid upon me to visit Friends across the Atlantic, and after my meeting had liberated me, two sisters offered to accompany me, while I greatly desired that a way might open for my husband to go." Just before the meeting that was to decide the matter of companionship, a letter of unknown authorship came to hand, containing a draft of $400, and saying, it was for my husband's expenses in accompanying me across the Atlantic. Caroline Talbot adding in her emphatic way, "I shall always believe that this came from the man whose life was saved."

LICENSE OF LIQUOR SALOON UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Decision of Judge Samuel R. Artman, of Boone Circuit, rendered at Lebanon, Indiana.

UNRESTRAINED TRAFFIC MAY BE TREATED AS NUISANCE.

As a second reason why the court should not lay hands upon the saloon license statute, counsel for the applicant contends that to strike down this statute would subject society to the innumerable woes and vices of an unrestrained liquor traffic, without any means of protection; that, in such a case, there would be no criminal law by which it can be suppressed.

Admitting, but not deciding, this last statement to be true, yet the position of counsel is not well balanced. The effect of counsel's position is to maintain that an unlawful business must be legalized before it can be suppressed. If it were legalized, the most that could be done would be to regulate and control it as a lawful business, but, treating it as unlawful, it can be suppressed, abated, prohibited and absolutely annihilated, and this can be effectually done without any criminal statute.

It is the settled law of the land that any occupation that naturally and inherently endangers the health, peace, safety, morals and welfare of the people is unlawful and a public nuisance.

Wood on Nuisance, Sec. 24.

State vs. Tabor, 34 Ind. Ap., 393.

A public nuisance may be abated, under the civil law, by injunction, and, if the nuisance-keeper fail to obey the injunction, he must face the court for contempt. In all probability, their remedy would be preferable to criminal proceedings.

So, this contention, in my judgment, presents no legal obstacle to an inquiry as to the validity of the saloon license statute, for common law prohibition can be enforced and society protected without a criminal statute. If a criminal statute be necessary, it is the duty of the Legislature to provide it. The failure of the Legislature to do its duty should not deter the court from the discharge of its sworn obligation.

NOT A COMMON LAW PRIVILEGE.

Is the licensing of the saloon business an invasion of the fundamental law? We have already determined that a person can not engage in the business as an inherent, common law privilege of citizenship, because the business is treated as dangerous to the public health, public morals and public safety. We have also reached the conclusion that a license to engage in the business legalizes the traffic (if it can be legalized) to the extent that it authorizes it. Can the Legislature legalize the destruction of the public health, the public morals and the public safety? Can the Legislature make lawful for a price that which is unlawful, because it contravenes the fundamental principle of government? Surely not.

In the absence of a license, the police power of the State regards any business, the inherent character, tendency and effect of which is to destroy the public health, the public morals or the public safety, as immoral and unlawful.

This is what the cases, heretofore cited, mean by holding that the right to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors is not a common law privilege inherent in the rights of citizenship.

It is not a right of citizenship, because, as the cases hold, its existence is detrimental to society and is dangerous to public and private morals and to the peace and good order of society.

This court might rest its decision of the case at bar upon the holding of the cases cited, that the sale of intoxicating liquors is detrimental to society and dangerous to public and private morals, and, for that reason, is unlawful at common law. To so rest the decision, would, of course, assume that this holding of these cases is well founded.

In order to disclose more fully the foundation for this holding, I quote from some of the leading courts, as to the character and effects of the saloon business:

Supreme Court of Kansas in State vs. Durion, 80 Pac., 987: "The commodity in controversy is intoxicating liquor. The article is one whose moderate use, even, is taken into account by actuaries of insurance companies, and which bars employment in classes of service involving prudent and careful conduct—an article conceded to be fraught with such contagious peril to society, that it occupies a different status before the courts and the Legislatures from other kinds of property, and places traffic in it upon a different plane from other kinds of business. It is still the prolific source of disease, misery, pauperism, vice and crime. Its power to weaken, corrupt, debauch and slay human character and human life is not destroyed or impaired because it may be susceptible of some innocent uses, or may be used with propriety on some occasions. The health, morals, peace and safety of the community at large are still threatened."

Supreme Court of Iowa in Lantz vs. State, 2 Iowa, 164: "There is no statistical or economical proposition better established, nor one to which a more general assent is given by reading and intelligent minds, than this: that the use of intoxicating liquors as a drink, is the cause of more want, pauperism, suffering, crime and public expense than any other cause and perhaps it should be said than all other causes combined. Even those who are opposed to restriction, oftentimes admit this truth. Every State applies the most stringent legal power to lotteries, gambling, keeping gambling houses and implements, and to debauchery and obscenity, and no one questions the right and justness of it; and yet how small is the weight of woe produced by all these united, when compared with that which is created by the use of intoxicating drinks alone."

Supreme Court of Missouri in State vs. Bixam, 82 S. W., 828: "The evils that result from the use of intoxicating liquors generally occur at the place where they are consumed, and the tendency to crime and pauperism follows in that place, and it can readily be seen why a Legislature would make a discrimination between the burden on a business which naturally breeds disorder, and which casts upon the general taxpayer an additional burden in the cost of prosecutions and increased police force, and a business which exports the intoxicating liquors to other States."

Supreme Court of South Carolina in State vs. Turner, 1 S. C., 106: "Experience has demonstrated that the unrestrained traffic in spirituous liquors is dangerous to the peace and welfare of society, and therefore it has long been settled that the law-making power may throw such restraints around that traffic as in the judgment of that department of the government may be necessary to secure the peace and welfare of society."

Supreme Court of South Carolina in State ex rel. George Vs. Aiken, 26 L. R. A., 352:—"We do not suppose there is a more potent factor in keeping up the necessity for asylums, penitentiaries and jails, and in producing pauperism and immorality throughout the entire country, than liquor, and yet it is argued that it is to be placed on the same footing with the breadstuffs and other ordinary commodities of life."

Supreme Court of Kansas in State ex rel. vs. Crawford, 42 American Reports, 186: "Probably no greater source of crime and sorrow has ever existed than social drinking saloons. Social drinking is the evil of evils. It has probably caused more drunkenness and has made more drunkards than all other causes combined, and drunkenness is a pernicious source of all kinds of crime and sorrow. It is a Pandora's box, sending forth innumerable ills and woes, shame and disgrace, indigence, poverty and want; social happiness destroyed; domestic broils and bickering engendered; social ties sundered; homes made desolate; families scattered; heart-rending partings; sin, crime and untold sorrows; not even hope left, but everything lost; and everlasting farewell to all true happiness and to all the nobler aspirations rightfully belonging to every true and virtuous human being."

Supreme Court of Indiana in 1855 in Beebe vs. the State, 6 Ind., 542: "That drunkenness is an evil, both to the individual and to the State, will probably be admitted. That its legitimate consequences are disease and destruction to the mind and body, will also be granted. That it produces from four-fifths to nine-tenths of all the crime committed, is the united testimony of those judges, prison-keepers, sheriffs, and others engaged in the administration of the criminal law, who have investigated the subject. That taxation to meet the expenses of pauperism and crime, falls upon and is borne by the people, follows as a matter of course. That its tendency is to destroy the peace, safety and well-being of the people, to secure which the first article in the Bill of Rights declares all free governments are instituted, is too obvious to be denied."

Supreme Court of the United States in Mugler vs. Kansas, 123 U. S., 205: "It is not necessary, for the sake of justifying the State legislation now under consideration, to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism and crime which have their origin in the use or abuse of ardent spirits. For we can not shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals and the public safety may be endangered by the general use of intoxicating drinks; nor the fact established by statistics accessible to every one, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country are, in some degree at least, traceable to this evil."

Supreme Court of the United States in Crowley vs. Christenson, 137 U. S., 86: "By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community, there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dram shop, where intoxicating liquors, in small quantities, to be drunk at the time, are sold indiscriminately to all parties applying. The statistics of every State show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source."

CONDEMNED BY LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENT.

The Legislature of Indiana has enacted its condemnation of the business by requiring that the nature of alcoholic drinks and their effects on the human system shall be included in the branches to be regularly taught in the common schools of the State. R. S. 1901, 5984 a.

FRUITS OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

It is not making the case too strong, to say that it is within the knowledge of every private citizen, of average information as to current events, that the business kills many, makes widows and orphans, fills almshouses, jails, penitentiaries, orphanages and insane asylums; that it frenzies the brain and directs the murderer's hand to plunge the fatal knife and discharge the deadly weapon.

The last sentence of the quotation from Crowley vs. Christenson, 137 U. S., will bear repeating: "The statistics of every State show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source."

If the proposition that any business, the inherent tendency and effect of which is to destroy the public health, the public morals or the public safety is immoral and unlawful is sound, it must follow, as the day follows the night, that the business, which is the source of a greater amount of crime and misery in every State, than any other cause, is the most immoral and the most unlawful business that there is in any State.

This is an inevitable conclusion from the premise. Logic will lead to no other result. So that the question for determination may now be stated in another form. Can the State sell the privilege or indulgence of producing the greatest amount of crime and misery? The natural tendency and effect of the saloon business is dangerous and detrimental to public and private morals and to the peace and good order of society, and because of this fact it contravenes the fundamental principle of self-preservation and because it does this, it is unlawful and does not have the inherent right to exist. It can not legally exist at all, unless the State can sell and delegate to it the right of existence. The State is organized for the self-preservation of its citizens in health, morality and safety. It is organized to enforce the right and prohibit the wrong. This is the paramount duty of the State to its constituent members, and it can not surrender the execution of it for a price. It is the imperative duty of the State to exercise the police power for the promotion and preservation of the public health, the public safety, the public and private morals and the general welfare.

Blue vs. Beach, 155 Ind., 121.

City of Frankfort vs. Irwin, 34 Ap., 280.

By Section 1 of the Bill of Rights, it is declared that the State of Indiana was founded for the peace, safety and well-being of the people, and, by Section 1, Article VIII, of the State Constitution, it is made the duty of the General Assembly to encourage, by all suitable means, the moral and intellectual improvement of the people.

Time.—Probably about 725 B. C.

Place.—Jerusalem, though the prophecy is applicable to the northern kingdom, as well.

Kings.—Hezekiah, king of Judah; Hoshea, king of Israel.

The twenty-eighth chapter of Isaiah is one of the most striking in the whole book—in beauty of style, strength of statement, analysis of character, and uncompromising truthfulness, it can hardly be surpassed.

The truths which it sets forth are just as applicable to the people and conditions of to-day, as they were to the men to whom they were originally addressed. The state of affairs in Jerusalem must have been very bad to justify the prophet in denouncing his countrymen in such strong language; but that he was justified, there seems no manner of doubt. He begins the chapter with a description of the sins of the people in the neighboring kingdom and states what will be the result there. He finds a similar condition in Judah, and he uses similar language. He saw the danger impending and warned his hearers to take heed. The Assyrian, who was to be the scourge of Samaria, would descend upon Judah, and the only hope for the nation was in righteousness. "No prophet ever threatened judgment more inexorable and complete than he. Yet, he never failed to tell the sinner how possible it was for him to be different." It is evident that the northern kingdom had not fallen when Isaiah spoke these words, and as Israel was carried away 722 B. C., Isaiah must have spoken about 725 B. C.

7. "But these also." The inhabitants of Judah. The Amer. R. V. makes the picture even stronger, "And even these reel with wines, and stagger with strong drink, they are swallowed up of wines, they stagger with strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment." Could there be a more accurate description of the effect of strong drink physically and mentally? The men who should have been the leaders of the people in righteousness were guides into sin; wine, not reason or truth, is their master.

9, 10. These verses are the reply of the accuser to Isaiah's arraignment. Note the ill-concealed insolence of the words, "Whom will he teach knowledge, and whom will he make to understand the message?" Are we infants just weaned? "For it is precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little." The words in Hebrew are short and simple and sound very much alike, so it is impossible to bring out the full force of the intended scorn. It is somewhat as if one should say, "I am tired of this continual dinning in my ears with such an a, b, c, a, b, c, a, b, c, as yours. 'Be good,' 'Be good,' 'Be good!'"

11. Isaiah now begins his reply to the mocking speech just quoted. Here the Revised Version should be followed. "Nay, but by men of strange lips and of another tongue will he speak to this people." You have not heard the true prophets of Jehovah; now strangers, the Assyrians, will speak to you, and you will have to hear them, and their language you will understand, for you will not be able to help yourselves.

12. "To whom he said, This is the rest, give ye rest to him that is weary; and this is the refreshing: yet, they would not hear." R. V. Jehovah has offered you rest and refreshing, but ye refused.

13. "Therefore shall the word of Jehovah be unto them precept upon precept," etc. You have scorned what I have sent unto you, calling it fit for little children, now "by these irritating monosyllables of gradual penalty shall God instruct you the second time."

The application of the whole lesson to the evils of drink is so obvious that it needs no comment.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Preach the depravity of men, but never apart from the possibilities that remain in them." Isaiah 1:18, 19.

2. God's ways with men are mostly commonplace; that is the hardest lesson we have to learn. . . . He speaks "not in undue excitement of soul and body, not in the stirring up of our passions, nor by enlisting our ambitions, not in thunder or in startling visions, but by everyday precepts of faithfulness, honor, and purity."

THINGS YOU HAVE LEARNED FROM NOBLE MEN AND WOMEN OUTSIDE THE BIBLE.

I Thess. 1:2-8.

Second-day, Third mo. 18.—Noble Abraham. Gen. 18:1-8.
Third-day, Third mo. 19.—Noble Moses. Ex. 4:18-23.
Fourth-day, Third mo. 20.—Noble David. 1 Sam. 17:33-37.

Seventh-day, Third mo. 23.—Noble Saul. Acts 9:1-9.

The word that is used to describe the characters we are to consider has been more fortunate than some of its companions. "Good," for instance, has been much abused, and a "good fellow" may lack much that goes to make up real manhood if only he is complaisant toward his friends' weaknesses and a ready partaker with them in their chosen diversions. On the other hand, we hear people spoken of as "good," or "too good," in a tone that implies anything but compliment. But of a noble man or woman, we feel we need no definition, or at least are sure that those who call them so intend only approval and commendation.

We do not always attain to what we admire, but it is always hopeful to find the power of appreciation and the spirit of admiration of that which is noble. In fact, this may be said to be the one pathway of hope for us all—that there is in us some chord that is in unison with the divine, that the likeness to God in which we were created is still such a fact that we can be made to realize our relationship. And it is this realized and outwrought relationship that makes the nobility of men and women, whether in the Bible or out of it.

If we should hunt for flaws in Abraham's life, the honest biographer has furnished us with material to reward such a search; the one asset which he seems to have possessed above his fellows is that of accessibility. God found him a man who could be got at and whose mind was open to impressions. Abram leaving Haran was obedient, but he was far below the interceding Abraham at Mamre. The course of tutelage might have been shortened, so far as we can judge, if only Abraham and Sarah had not hindered their own blessing. Yet, what is that but a mirror of ourselves? But faith remained and grew until its full proof and flower at Mt. Moriah, where the promised son was given a second time as from the dead.

The examples that follow—Moses and David, Ruth and Mary—are brought before us in a setting that emphasizes the individual relationship each one had in the plans of God; but their lesson to us is largely lost if we fail to apply the method to the lives of the men and women of to-day. What God wrought through them was their work, but His labors are not done, nor are His methods changed. Human agents are still His instruments, and men are still responding to His call and teaching. Nobility is still about us, veiled sometimes, but none the less the present manifestation of God if we can but read it.

An oyster dredger on the Mississippi coast—uncouth and unwholesome in appearance, almost to repulsiveness—recently narrated to me his experience in the great storm of September last. The water had risen around his rough little cottage until it was waist high to him as he stood on his doorstep urging his wife to let him try to get her and the children to higher ground. She did not think it possible, and told him to go and leave them and save himself. "But, you see, I could not do the like o' that," so he stepped into the house, and as he did so the steps on which he had stood floated away. The water still rose, and he and his eldest son broke up the ceiling and got the others into the space above. Again his wife urged him to go. "But I couldn't do it, mister. All we could do was stay there and trust to One above." And so they stayed until the little shanty was swept down the stream and lodged between two trees, where they remained until all were rescued after hours of uncertainty. But had he not "won his spurs?"

The inward influences and illuminations which come to us through those who have loved us are deeper than any that we can realize; they penetrate all our life, and assure us that there must be a fountain of life and love from which they and we are continually receiving strength to bear and to hope.—*F. Talk not of wasted affection! Affection never was wasted.
If it enrich not the heart of another, its waters returning Back to their springs like the rain, shall fill them full of refreshing.
That which the fountain sends forth returns again to the fountain.

[FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.]

WORSHIP.

I.

... patching together other men's writings and observations, so much as will hold him speaking an hour, while the glass runs . . . —Barclay.

He from the pulpit for an hour will bawl
His sermon, well and properly "prepared";
But not a whit is any yokel scared,
He not a whit disturbs the drowsy Hall.
The 'Squire, who—(like a prize ox in its stall)—
Looked out the text, then at the preacher stared,
Into the realm of Sunday Slumber peered.
The Hourglass down, the Clerk rose with a drawl.

A wheezing of the organ, and a trill
Of psalmody; a crowding to the porch;
A clearing for the Quality a way
Across the churchyard. And was this the torch
Of worship, lit? Saints gather to fulfil
Their Lord's behest to meet, and watch and pray.

II.

This is a divine and spiritual worship, which the world neither knoweth nor understandeth; which the vulture's eye seeth not into.—ibid.

The silence of the bare place was so sweet,
Where many sat, feeling no call to speak.
They'd been attacked by Persecution's beak,
Whose bodeful wings did at their dwellings beat.
With Peace are shod the blessed Gospel's feet.
Yet, by all evidence of strength judged, weak
Were these poor worshippers; both mute and meek;
Not worthy recognition in the street!

A row outside!—posse of pikemen stern,
And musketeers with crafty magistrate.
Burst in! Make havoc with the Friends ye find.
King Charles need not suspicious or irate Become. From Quakers he has yet to learn True worship monarchs may not loose, or bind.
—A. W. Webster.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

John Chawner, clerk of California Yearly Meeting, has changed his address from 1072 Kulswood, to 765 Summit Avenue, Pasadena, Cal.

A notice of the Friends Summer School of Religious History, to be held at Bryn Mawr College, the 14th to the 22d of Sixth month, appears in another column.

A. M. Hinshaw, Iowa Yearly Meeting, is engaged in evangelistic work in the limits of Sterling Quarterly Meeting, having been at Calvary Meeting, in Barton County, Kan., for the last two weeks.

The Bryn Mawr Club, Chicago, has just secured between $13,000 and $14,000 to add to the endowment fund of Bryn Mawr College. The energy and devotion of this club is greatly to be admired and commended.

We hope Friends will be well represented at the great National Peace Congress, which meets in Carnegie Hall, New York City, the 14th to 17th of next month. Judging from the information sent to this office, the program promises to be a good one.

Oscar Roberts writes from Luipaardsylei, Transvaal, South Africa, calling our attention to the fact that in an introductory sentence to the missionary matter published Twelfth month 6, 1906, we spoke of Eruwa as being in the Transvaal. We should have located it in Lagos Colony, West Africa.

The "meeting for sufferings" of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has published a pamphlet, entitled, "An Invitation to Attend Meetings for Worship of the Society of Friends, with a Few Particulars of the Manner of Holding Them." It will be handed to visitors at regular and appointed meetings or to possible visitors, and explains the rather "unusual mode of worship."

Our missionary, W. Irving Kelsey, from C. Victoria, Tamps, Mex., informs us "that the Mexican press is just now making a crusade on bull-fighting. Also several anti-bull-fighting organizations have been formed. American tourists are among the best patrons of this barbarous pastime. In some places they could not be a financial success were it not for the American contingent."

J. Arthur Wollam has just closed a three-weeks' meeting at Grassy Run, Wilmington Yearly Meeting. The preaching was excellent and the attendance good. The spirit and methods of the evangelist were above criticism. In addition to general good effects, there were several conversions and renewals, and some additions to the Church will probably result. A few established Christians made very real and marked advance in spiritual life.

Sterling Quarterly Meeting was held at Sterling, Kan., the 22nd to 24th ult. This is one of the smallest quarterly meetings of Kansas Yearly Meeting. It was specially favored at this time by having L. Clarkson, Hinshaw, the general superintendent of Evangelistic and Church Extension Work, present. His ministry commended itself to the intelligence of the people, being of a highly spiritual character. Friends who are thinking of changing their location would do well to look this way, as the country is beautiful and productive.

Bloomington Quarterly Meeting (Indiana) was held from the 15th to the 17th ult. The weather was most favorable, and attendance large, considering the prevailing ailments. The business of each day was quickly dispatched in harmony. Louis E. Stout, yearly meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, was present and preached each day; also addressed the Bible-school conference, taking the parable of the good Samaritan for the foundation of his discourse. The Academy Association, on Seventh-day evening, took on a new feature. The entire program was responded to by students of thirty years ago, which was much enjoyed by the audience.

A ten-days' series of meetings has just concluded at Newberg, Ore. Charles Replogle, of Everett, Washington having felt for some time a concern to visit this meeting; labored in the love of the Gospel most acceptably. His ministry was marked by a quiet, tender, powerful setting forth of the glorious personality of Jesus Christ, and hearts felt the strange, wondrous thrill of the Master's appeal. No sensational methods were used, but the living evidence of the Holy Spirit's work was manifest. The meeting has been remarkably quickened in its love and loyalty to the person of Christ, and seed has been sown which will bear a rich and abiding harvest.

Washington's Birthday was observed in a unique and very fitting way by Pacific College. It was made the occasion of the formal raising of a United States flag, which Joshua L. Baily had presented to the College some weeks previous. A letter from Joshua L. Baily on his presenting the flag was read by Mabel H. Douglas. A short address on the history of the American flag and its significance to us, as well as our duty as Friends, was given by Prof. P. K. Jones. O. W. Holmes' poem, "God Bless Our Fatherland," was read by Prof. W. C. Woodward. Prof. H. D. Crumly closed the program by a stirring plea in behalf of peace as held by Friends.

A recent communication from Farmland, Ind., says: "A revival is now in progress in Farmland particular meeting, conducted by the pastor, John L. Kittrell. There have been more than 20 conversions already, and the meetings continue with increasing interest. Charles E. Hiatt and wife, from Muncie; Ira Johnson, yearly meeting superintendent of Evangelistic Work, and Fred. Smith, of Spiceland, have all acceptably attended some of the services."

Susie Wagner recently conducted a successful meeting at Parker, Ind. A large number of renewals and conversions were reported, and several have applied for membership with Friends.

On First month 21st, a most successful series of meetings began at Van Wert, Ohio. The first evening was prayer service, led by two of the members; the second evening was directed by two C. E. officers and workers; the third evening by the Bible-school superintendent and teachers; the fourth, by the Ladies' Aid Society, Anne Lewis giving a splendid explanation of the work of the society, its object and place, and the fifth evening all united in the service. The pastor, Tennyson Lewis, took an active part in all the meetings. The meetings which followed were largely occupied with preaching. The second week, Virgil Brock, a young man, twenty years of age, from another part of the quarterly meeting, assisted in the meetings, especially in the song service. As a result, between 60 and 70 were converted and reclaimed, and 32 united with Friends. Other names will come before the next monthly meeting. The meetings were of great interest from the beginning to the close, and were largely attended.

Friends in and about Van Wert, Ohio, are greatly encouraged. Several have recently united with Friends, both in Van Wert and at each of the three country points. Tennyson Lewis and family are doing pastoral work in town, and John McMillan and wife have charge of the country points. The C. E. and Junior Endeavor in town are enjoying a great increase in membership.

T. H. and H. M. Jessup write from Elmwood, Cal., from whom we quote the following: On Second month 22d, the foundation of our church at Elmwood was begun, not in commemoration of the great "Father of his Country," but it is a sweet thought that it is so.

Elmwood is a town situated on the Santa Fé R. R., 125 miles south and east of San Francisco, in the fertile valley of the San Joaquin River. Within a year's time the membership has grown to over 30, and others will be here after the school year closes. With a longing to gather in others and hold those who are here, we have organized for work. Thomas Armstrong, our yearly meeting superintendent, visited us in December, at which time we had a temporary organization. He had wonderful liberty in service with the people holding two meetings, and conducted the Sabbath services, all of which were a great uplift to those who attended, which included almost the entire community. The next week Elmwood Mills was with us, who spoke morning and evening with much earnestness. The unity of the different churches, as we have met to worship, has been something beautiful. This, we consider, has been a blessing to us all, and think it fruitful for good. The Christian denomination has bought the building in which we have been holding our meetings, and we thought the time had come for action on our part. The congregation also was outgrowing the accommodations of the old building. We will, it is hoped, be worshipping in our own house in a short time. We have a temperance community, which is building up fast with people of nearly all denominations. With good land and reasonable prices and with abundance of irrigation water, the country will, with the hundreds of acres of fruit trees and grape vineyards being put out, blossom as the rose. May the vineyard of the Lord also be fruitful.

The remodeled Denver Friends' church building was dedicated at the eleven o'clock meeting on Sabbath, Second month 24th. The Penn College board very generously arranged for President Rosenberger to stop at Denver to attend the service on his way to California. He preached the dedication sermon, and his beautiful message on "Worship" was very helpful and inspiring. His presence and service were greatly appreciated by the large audience, which completely filled the house, and especially by the members, who have borne the burden and responsibility of the work. There were many Penn graduates and old students in the audience, to whom the service was very interesting and precious.

The addition to the building provides a well-lighted Sunday-school primary room, a library-room, a pleasant basement-room for Sunday-school and social uses, a well-furnished toilet-room, and a furnace by which the whole building is heated. The work was done at a cost of $900.00, only $400.00 of which had been provided. The committee in charge of the building work had asked Chas. E. Lewis, of Paoni, Colo., to request subscriptions, at the close of the dedication service, to cover the remaining $500.00. In a brief way, at the close of President Rosenberger's sermon, he presented to the audience the nature and purpose of the work, and asked for subscriptions to cover the deficit. In opening the subscription, he announced the generous gift of $100.00 to the work from the pastor, George D. Weeks and his wife, and the people, responded joyfully with a willingness rarely seen on such occasions. In fifteen minutes the amount was more than subscribed. It was a day long to be remembered by Denver Friends, and closed with a lecture by President Rosenberger on his visit to Palestine. In this meeting, also, the president was greeted by a large and appreciative audience, who listened with great interest to his address of an hour and a half. Many words of appreciation were heard.

The Salvation Army has a peculiar faculty for looking after the extreme classes of society. Their work for those in destitute circumstances, their care of the insane, for those in prisons and like classes, are well known. They now propose to establish an anti-suicide bureau in all the large centers of population. The plan is, briefly, to form a center or station, supplied with funds and equipped with the machinery of philanthropy, in charge of tactful officials, who will supply the means and encouragement to divert persons bent upon self-destruction from their purpose. The officials will reason with the wretched and desperate, and place them on the path to self-support or in the way of alleviating their misery, whether of mind or body. A similar undertaking was tried in Cincinnati sometime ago by courageous philanthropists, but it failed, because those reached were scheming imposters rather than those really in despair. Men who are desperate enough to kill themselves are not, as a rule, in a frame of mind which would induce them to seek palliation; but we know of no organization better fitted for this difficult undertaking than the Salvation Army.

Some students of household economy have been recently projecting schemes of co-operation, which will remove some of the perplexing and undesirable features connected with housekeeping. A Prof. Otto Fick, from Copenhagen, has recently come to this country to inaugurate what he considers a practical way out. All that is required is the building of co-operative flat houses, each not less than five stories high, and to contain not less than

AS TO FLAVOR

FOUND HER FAVORITE AGAIN.

A bright young lady of the Buckeye State tells how she came to be acutely sensitive as to the taste of coffee:

"My health had been very poor for several years," she says, "I loved coffee and drank it for breakfast, but only learned by accident, as it were, that it was the cause of the constant, dreadful headaches from which I suffered every day, and of the nervousness that drove sleep from my pillow and so deranged my stomach that everything I ate gave me acute pain.

"My condition finally got so serious that I was advised by my doctor to go to a hospital. I went to one of the largest in Detroit. There they gave me what I supposed was coffee, and I thought it was the best I ever drank; but I have since learned it was Postum. I gained rapidly and came home in four weeks.

"Somehow the coffee we used at home didn't taste right when I got back. I tried various kinds, but none tasted as good as that I drank in the hospital, and all brought back the dreadful headaches and the 'sick-all-over' feeling. At last one day I got a package of Postum Food Coffee, and the first taste of it I took I said, 'that's the good coffee we had in the hospital!' I have drank it ever since, three times a day, and eat Grape-Nuts for my breakfast. I have no more headaches, and feel better than I have for years." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

25 families. Most of the flats will be three-room affairs, all the cooking to be done in a big central kitchen. The company owning the building will keep a corps of servants to supply all the service required by tenants. Meals are sent to each family by a dumbwaiter. Capital is to be provided by the subscription of the tenant to a certain amount of the company's stock—about as much as the rent would amount to. In each proposed building there is to be a kindergarten in which children may be left while parents go out. The plan would, it is said, make the cost of living 20 per cent. lower than at present. Professor Fick has been instrumental in starting up co-operative flats in Copenhagen and Stockholm. We will not venture a prediction as to the outcome of this scheme; but this much seems quite certain, changes toward co-operative house-keeping are likely to become more prevalent in the near future.

The Inter-Synodical Convention of men of the Presbyterian Church in the United States met in Omaha, Neb., recently with more than 1,000 delegates present. Their action concerning missionary efforts is suggestive. They declare it to be their judgment that the number of human beings in non-Christian lands for which the Presbyterian Church is directly responsible in the work of evangelization in this generation is approximately 100,000,000. Also, that their foreign missionaries, native pastors, Bible women and teachers, ought to be increased, in the immediate future, until it reaches the number of one worker for each 25,000 unevangelized persons. This would mean for them 4,000 American missionaries, or about five times as many as they now have. It is their judgment that not less than $6,000,000 a year should be their appropriation for mission work. In order to meet this demand, they believe that churches should strive for an average contribution of $5.00 per member. Their resolutions closed with the following: "Recognizing that the successful accomplishment of this project involves not only the expenditure of wealth, but also of lives, we set ourselves to pray that the Holy Spirit of God may choose and send consecrated men and women into this work of foreign missions in sufficient numbers to secure the evangelization of the world in this generation."

A CAPITOL JOKE.

"John, dear," said the wife, coaxingly, "instead of buying an expensive ready-made dress I could get the material for $20. Isn't that a capital idea?"

"If that's all a new dress would cost, go ahead," replied the faithful John.

A little later he was scanning the bill, which mentioned $24 for making, $29 for lace, $6 for buttons, and $11 for findings.

"When you spoke of a 'capital idea,'" he commented reproachfully, "I did not suppose that you meant the Harrisburg Capitol idea."—Coast Seaman's Journal.

A MESSAGE.

Joy follows sorrow,
Rest follows pain,
In God's to-morrow
All is made plain.

Clouds that envelop,
Touched by the sun,
Rise into glory,
When day is done.

Out of night's darkness
Stars brightly shine;
Thus, to the trusting soul,
Comes light divine.

Life is a parable,
And, rightly read,
We can accept it,
Feeling no dread.

He who created
Can keep to the end,
Our Savior, Redeemer, Deliverer and Friend.

THE WHOLE FAMILY.

MOTHER FINDS A FOOD FOR GROWN-UPS AND CHILDREN AS WELL.

Food that can be eaten with relish and benefit by the children as well as the older members of the family, makes a pleasant household commodity.

Such a food is Grape-Nuts. It not only agrees with and builds up children, but older persons who, from bad habits of eating have become dyspeptics.

A Philadelphia lady, after being benefited herself, persuaded her husband to try Grape-Nuts for stomach trouble. She writes:

"About eight years ago I had a severe attack of congestion of stomach and bowels. From that time on, I had to be very careful about eating, as nearly every kind of food then known to me, seemed to cause pain.

"Four years ago I commenced to use Grape-Nuts. I grew stronger and better and from that time I seldom have been without it; have gained in health and strength, and am now heavier than I ever was.

"My husband was also in bad condition—his stomach became so weak that he could eat hardly anything with comfort. I got him to try Grape-Nuts and he soon found his stomach trouble had disappeared.

"My girl and boy, three and nine years old, do not want anything else for breakfast but Grape-Nuts and more healthy children cannot be found." Names given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little booklet, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

NOTICES.

To Sunday-school Workers throughout the World: Christian Greeting:

The Executive Committee of the World's Fifth Sunday-school Convention, American Section, earnestly invites Sunday-school workers in all lands to unite in observing Sunday, Fifth month 19, 1907, as World's Sunday-school Day by engaging in private and public prayer as occasion may offer for Sunday-schools throughout the world, and especially for the World's Fifth Sunday-school Convention, which will then be in session in the city of Rome.

Ministers are asked to preach a special sermon, placing fresh emphasis upon the Sunday-school as a most promising field for Evangelization and character building.

A universal compliance with this suggestion will make this the greatest day in the history of the Sunday-school. Not all may go to Rome, but each one may have a share in promoting the cause which the convention represents.

By direction of the committee.

GEORGE W. BAILEY, Chairman.

There will be two morning courses of lectures, one on the "Religious Message of the Bible," and the other on the "Mystical Movements in Church History." A Bible class will also be held each morning. Out-door conferences on Quaker problems and on teaching religion to children will form important features of the school. A course of evening lectures by eminent speakers is also being arranged. New Beatitudes

Blessed are they that heal, for theirs is the royalty of service.

Blessed are they that cleanse and clothe the body, for they give the soul a chance.

Blessed are they that teach the dignity of labor, for they shall regenerate the earth.

Blessed are they that hunger and battle for justice, for they are brothers of the Christ.

Blessed are the cheermakers, for they shall be called the sons of the morning.

Blessed are they that minister of the mind of Christ, for they are of the inner household of God.

Events and Comments.

The date for the next Hague Conference has not yet been announced, but it is quite certain that it will be held in the early part of the sixth month.

"Gipsy" Smith, the noted English evangelist, has made a profound stir in Brooklyn. Large crowds have been attending his meetings, and the results have been very gratifying to the promoters.

Acting in compliance with the new immigration law passed Second month 20th, President Roosevelt has issued an order prohibiting Japanese and Koreans from entering continental United States from Hawaii, Canada or Mexico.

Does the fact that some of our Wall Street financiers have recently called on President Roosevelt to discuss proposed legislative measures indicate that the National Government is to become a leading factor in high finance? Some of our journalists seem to think so, and the drift certainly has been in that direction.

It was reported some weeks ago that Henry Van Dyke, the eminent poet and author, who has been Professor of English Literature in Princeton University for the past few years, had offered his resignation. Overwhelmed by petitions and letters which came from alumni, students, faculty and trustees, he has decided to remain.

Local option in Vermont now appears to be working well. Last week's elections resulted in but 25 towns voting to license saloons, there being 30 the year before and many more in 1903 and 1904. Burlington, which started out in 1903, after the repeal of the State prohibitory law, by going for license by 1760 plurality has this year gone for no license by 431.

Thaw does not seem to be the only person who has "brain storms." With abundant crops, high wages and business of all kinds active and profitable, one of the most remarkable panics in recent years seized Wall Street last week. The movement was irresistible. No one has an adequate explanation. The whole affair seemed to be psychic. The uncertainty caused by so much State legislation affecting corporate interests, and the stringency in the money market which has prevailed for several months, are possibly responsible for the mental condition of Wall Street financiers; but neither are adequate explanations for the great fall in stocks.

Secretary Root believes in small colleges. In a recent talk before the Hamilton College Association of Washington, he expressed a number of thoughts of interest to all concerned in higher education. "You cannot raise a strong and virile people," he declared, "with paving stones between them and mother earth, and it was with deep thankfulness and real joy that I sent my sons away from the crowded city to spend the four years of their college life among the hills and valleys of old Oneida." And he continued: "The men who make the popular will are not those known to fame or in high political places. They are the doctors making their daily rounds along country roads, the lawyers who counsel in town meetings, the ministers in country places, the teachers in village schools. These are the real molders of the public mind, these the leaders of the people; and the men in more conspicuous positions merely do their will."

It should not escape attention that the right of the States to pass laws prohibiting the use of the flag of the United States for advertising purposes has been affirmed by the Supreme Court in an opinion written by Justice Harlan. The case had been appealed from the Supreme Court of Nebraska on behalf of two Omaha liquor dealers, who had been convicted of selling beer in bottles decorated with the national colors. Justice Harlan's opinion affirmed the decision of the State courts, and upheld the right of the State to protect the flag, the emblem of the nation's power, against indignity. He said that the use of the flag as an advertisement on beer bottles cheapens and degrades it, and the court was unwilling to hold that legislation prohibiting such a use of the national colors is an abridgment of personal rights as contemplated by the national constitution. It should be added that Justice Peckham dissented. The action of the highest federal court in this matter is of wide interest, for most States have passed laws forbidding the use of the flag for advertising purposes.

John Alexander Dowie, the founder of Zion City, and the first Apostle of the Christian Catholic Church, died in Zion City, the 9th inst. During the last few years factional strife has almost consumed the energy of his followers. Most of them deserted him, even his own family. Many of our readers will remember how this remarkable community was formed, where all things should be shared in common, and all disease healed by a Divine touch. The remarkable thing about the movement was its phenomenal success. Great numbers of people flocked to Dowie's community. A partial explanation can possibly be found

CHARCOAL STOPS GAS ON YOUR STOMACH.

WONDERFUL ABSORBING POWER OF CHARCOAL WHEN TAKEN IN THE FORM OF STUART'S CHARCOAL LOZENGES.
 TRIAL PACKAGE SENT FREE.

Charcoal, pure, simple charcoal, absorbs 100 times its own volume of gas. Where does the gas go to? It is just absorbed by the charcoal,—the gas disappears and there is left a pure, fresh, sweet atmosphere, free from all impurities and germs.

That's what happens in your stomach when you take one or two of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges, the most powerful purifiers science has yet discovered.

You belch gas in company, sometimes, by accident, greatly to your own humiliation. That is because there is a great amount of gas being formed in your stomach by fermenting food. Your stomach is not digesting your food properly. Gas is inevitable. Whenever this happens, just take one or two of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges right after eating, and you will be surprised how quickly they will act. No more belchings; no more sour risings. Eat all you want and what you want, and then if there is any gas going to be formed, one of these wonderful little absorbers, a Stuart Charcoal Lozenge will take care of all the gas.

And it will do more than that. Every particle of impurity in your stomach and intestines is going to be carried away by the charcoal. No one seems to know why it does this, but it does, and does it wonderfully. You notice the difference in your appetite, general good feeling, and in the purity of your blood, right away.

You'll have no more bad taste in your mouth or bad breath, either from drinking, eating or smoking. Other people will notice your bad breath quicker than you will yourself. Make your breath pure, fresh and sweet, so when you talk to others you won't disgust them. Just one or two Stuart Charcoal Lozenges will make your breath sweet, and make you feel better all over for it. You can eat all the onions and odorous foods you want, and no one can tell the difference.

Besides, charcoal is the best laxative known. You can take a whole boxful and no harm will result. It is a wonderfully easy regulator.

And then, too, it filters your blood,—every particle of poison or impurity in your blood is destroyed, and you begin to notice the difference in your face first thing—your clear complexion.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made from pure willow charcoal, and just a little honey is put in to make them palatable, but not too sweet.

They will work wonders in your stomach, and make you feel fine and fresh. Your blood and breath will be purified.

We want to prove all this to you, so just send for a free sample to-day. Then after you get it and use it, you will like them so well that you will go to your druggist and get a 25c. box of these Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges.

Send us your name and address to-day and we will at once send you by mail a sample package free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 54 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

THE EPHESIAN BENEDICTION.

When an intense situation is reached in Paul's correspondence and one looks for a sweeping condemnation of some faction, suddenly there is a pause and then a benediction breaks forth, which includes and unites the entire body. The most uniting of all these matchless benedictions is the one at the end of the Ephesian epistle: Grace be unto all those who sincerely love our Lord, Jesus Christ."

We need a pause now, in the midst of the noise and confusion which is disturbing our own peace and endangering our future prosperity, for this uniting benediction to spread over our church and settle upon us all: Grace be unto all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. This touches at once the fundamental basis of our Christianity. It is this common love for the Lord Jesus Christ that makes us a church. There never has been a time when the followers of this Savior have held the same views; there never will be a time when the thoughts of individual men will run in the same mould. That would destroy individuality and personal freedom. It is, too, impossible to have a dead level of unvarying practice in all our churches and communities, and it would be wholly undesirable if it were possible. So long as there are peculiarities in disposition and character there will be variety in the ways of expressing religious feeling. There always has been, and there always will be, a conservative and a progressive wing. The type will shift from generation to generation. What was progressive in one period will become conservative in the next period, but the two extremes will always be there, and they will always find it difficult to be patient with each other. The one important thing—which cannot be missed without utter peril to the church—is love to our Lord Jesus Christ. Where that prevails in sincerity it cements hearts, even though heads do not agree. "Knowledge" is distinctly on a lower level. We all know in part, and one Christian's bit of knowledge seems to contradict another Christian's fragment, and there arises contention and confusion. It seems as though the seamless robe of truth would be torn in twain. The moment a controlling love for Jesus Christ floods the two men's hearts they rise to a higher level of unity and the chasm is bridged.

So, too, with divergent practices. When "forms" are given the place of first importance they raise disagreement and provoke dissension. There have been no fiercer hates than those engendered over religious forms and practices. When a sincere love for the Lord Jesus Christ comes into the first place forms grow weaker and sink into the background. Men who have been bitter in their oppositions gather 'round the same Divine Figure and find unity in their common love.

This happens even with conservative and progressive wings. The issues seem vital, and the situation gets often to the point of intense strain. Each wing believes the other is ruining the church, and they pin offensive labels on each other. But let a warm flood of love for Jesus Christ sweep into the two wings so that their common Christ grows more important to them than their partisan battle cries, and immediately the distance between the two wings diminishes. Conservative and progressive discover that they are brothers with common tasks, because they have a common Savior. Let us keep saying this Ephesian benediction until it sinks down into our souls, and we have a revelation of the uniting power of unfeigned love for the Lord Jesus Christ.

ESPECIALLY MEMBERS OF THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH.

"As the opportunity occurs," writes the Apostle Paul, "let us treat everyone with kindness, and especially members of the household of faith." How sweeping the first part of this most pregnant passage. How far it carries us out on the wings of imagination to compass the whole world. Be kind to everyone. The thought comes with a thrill which inspires, and we think of far off men, and golden days and distant deeds. But what is the matter with the Apostle in his second thought? What can he mean by this narrowing especially? We are not in the right frame of mind to be held up in this fashion. As a Friend said recently, "I am surprised that Paul should have said it, it seems so contrary to his broad democratic spirit." But let us not be hasty in our judgment. Possibly it is not so narrow after all. The Apostle may have been thinking of a number of very good people who were neglecting their own meeting and at the same time burning up with zeal for the heathen or the needy in a distant city. It is not altogether unlikely, if we can judge the Galatian Christians by those of our own time, that the very ones who were so lavish with their general sympathies did less, as a rule, than those who began to practice kindness at home. Whatever else the Apostle may have had in mind the passage admits of this application, and the lesson is pertinent to us. It is a unique way of telling us where and how to begin. Not to the person who is absent, but to the one who is present; not with the equipment of to-morrow, but with what we have to-day, are we to be kind. Kindness should begin at home. The genuine article goes farther, even, as opportunity offers, embracing the whole world, but it is centrifugal, not centripetal, in its growth.

Opportunity for this kind of growth presents itself in every local meeting. If we can learn the lesson of kindness to our neighbors then we can face the world with confidence. If kindness prevails in all the perplexing situations confronting our Society, then we can expect victory in the world. And how potent is the force of victory begun—how strong the force of example and consistency—the force of the sermon of a life. Viewed in this light, Paul's "especially" to the household of faith, are words of wisdom from a broad-minded, practical apostle.

Here, also, is a principle especially applicable to the home—that sacred center on earth where kindness should have its birth, and from which it should overflow. We remember living for a time in a family where Scripture reading and prayer were regular morning exercises. The church and pastor were always remembered, likewise the rulers of the land, and sometimes we were led to foreign fields. Before each meal, also, thanks were offered to our Heavenly Father for the fresh manifestation of His goodness spread before us. But we never shall forget the morning when our host finished saying the blessing with one breath, and with the next severely scolded his wife for burning the pancakes. The peoples in the remote corners of the earth were remembered with tenderest entreaty, the choicest blessings were evoked for those high in the State, but the one who lived and toiled and cared for him, his truest, closest friend on earth, was rebuked. May we learn more perfectly as the opportunities occur to "treat everyone with kindness, especially members of the household of faith."

[FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.]

A MISSIONARY OPENING.

BY JOHN R. CARY.

The call for workers in foreign lands is just now loud and insistent, but I want to call attention to a field presenting most of the characteristics of foreign work and yet lying at our doors. Thousands of ignorant, superstitious people whose need of the Gospel is as great as that of the Mexicans, for instance, are located within a few hours of such great cities as Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Pittsburgh; and the call to enlighten them is supplemented by the instinct of self-preservation, for they are acquiring citizenship as time goes on.

In the soft coal district of western Pennsylvania dozens of little, raw, unkempt villages are clustered about the mouths of newly-opened coal mines, the houses built by contract in the cheapest possible manner, located among the fresh stumps, connected only by foot-paths, the surroundings decorated only by tin cans and piles of rubbish. Packed into these rough houses are the large families of the foreign miners, largely Slavs and Italians, rough, ignorant, but kindly of disposition and prompt to respond to kindness. They speak but little English, only acquiring enough to get along in matters of business, yet they learn quite readily.

Our attention has been called to this situation in Baltimore, for the district is within our nominal limits, and we have isolated members living in some of these villages, men whose training as miners makes them available for positions as foremen. One of our ministers visiting these members last year was much impressed by the opening for work, the one family of Friends in a place making a nucleus from which to begin. In one village a minister of another denomination has made a start very wisely by securing employment in a "company store," thus providing for his support and getting into contact with the people in a natural way.

Baltimore Friends would be very glad to give such support as they can to work among these people, but their whole problem in the Pennsylvania meetings is a hard one. It is exceedingly difficult to keep any meeting active and strong without the encouragement and support of other parts of the organization, and we have three small meetings located from 40 to 80 miles apart and from 125 to 200 miles from the rest of the yearly meeting. One is in a village of perhaps 200 residents, another in a town of, say, 2,000, and the third in a larger place of perhaps 4,000 inhabitants. In all these places there is a kindly feeling for Friends, and good audiences greet the visiting minister, but in two of the meetings there is no resident minister. Does not the whole situation present as strong claims as can be formulated? And does it not possess very hopeful features not always to be found?

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

PALESTINE AND THE WORK OF FRIENDS.

BY ROSA E. LEE.

The first Protestant missionary in Palestine was Levi Parsons. He was sent out by the American Board of Foreign Missions, which was succeeded in 1870 by The American Presbyterian Board. He reached Jerusalem in 1821, but died the next year. This Board then decided to open in Syria, north of Palestine. They chose Beyrout as a center, and for eighty-five years have carried on almost continuous missionary labor there. At the end of the first forty years, with the exception of two boarding-schools founded and a translation of the Bible into Arabic begun, they saw very little visible results from their labor.

Let us review the situation at the close of the year 1905. The Arabic translation of the Bible was finished in 1865, and of the 59,000,000 pages of literature published by the American Press at Beyrout, over 47,000,000 were Holy Scriptures. From this press our own mission at Ram Allah gets its Arabic school-books, tracts, hymn-books and Bibles. One of their first boarding-schools grew into the Syrian Protestant College, now controlled by a Board of Trustees in New York City, and carrying a staff of 63, with about 800 students. The other became the American Seminary, a large boarding-school for girls. The Presbyterians have about 40 American men and women as missionaries in eight large districts, 200 native workers in 100 centers, a church membership of 2,500, with 7,000 children in their mission-schools, and over 6,000 of these belong to the Sunday-school and are known as Protestants.

Thus, we see what has been wrought by God through our sister mission in the North, and to some extent the same opportunities are offered to us, and there is no reason why we should not expect as much and more to be accomplished by Friends if we are as faithful to the work in Palestine in the next forty-five years as the Presbyterians have been to the work in Syria in the last forty-five.

We are the only American denomination doing mission work in Palestine.

The Christian Alliance are doing some undenominational work.

Samuel Gobat, a young German, visited Palestine in 1827. He afterwards went as a missionary to Abyssinia, but returned to Jerusalem in 1846. He was appointed by the King of Prussia to be bishop in Jerusalem. He began his missionary labors by establishing schools for boys. When Eli and Sibyl Jones first visited Palestine forty years ago they found a little day-school for boys at Ram Allah, which was under this bishop. At his death, in 1879, the Queen of England appointed a bishop to succeed him, and the Church of England still carry on the work commenced by Samuel Gobat. But there are many places untouched, especially many villages without either church or school; some of these get only one visit a year from a missionary, and some get no visits at all.

THE WORK THAT FRIENDS HAVE DONE AND ARE DOING.

In 1868 and '69, Eli and Sibyl Jones made their second visit to Palestine. During this visit they started a day-school for girls at Ram Allah, with a native as teacher. In 1876, they made their third visit and the foundation stone for the Boys' Training Home at Brumana was laid, Theophilus Waldemeier having opened a day-school for boys at that place three years before. In 1880, The Girls' Training Home at Brumana was established.

Sometime after this the work was divided. The English Friends took charge of the work at Brumana, and the New England Friends took that at Ram Allah.

Since then the work at Brumana has grown and now they have 36 boarders and 24 day-pupils in the boys' school; 49 boarders and 20-day pupils in the girls' school, and over 1,000 children in 15 day-schools. They maintain a hospital with 19 beds and a cot. Besides this building and the large school buildings, they also own a comfortable meeting-house. Thirty-seven native teachers help in educational and evangelistic work, and 12 English missionaries are situated in three different stations.

The work at Ram Allah has had a slow but steady growth, and has shed an influence over the people of Palestine that only eternity can measure.

The number of American missionaries at this place has always been small, never over five, and now only three. The mission has been unfortunate in having had many changes in its American staff, but very fortunate in having had constant, faithful native help.

In 1889, The Girls' Training Home, in Ram Allah, was opened, with Huldah Leyton as matron. The first family of girls numbered 15. Since then the house has been enlarged, more land has been purchased, and now 34 girls, besides the superintendent's family and several teachers, reside in a well-furnished home, surrounded by grounds in which are beautiful flowers, well-kept walks, many kinds of fruit trees and a large vineyard. The girls are taught to look after their souls, minds and bodies. They often absorb as much from the Christian atmosphere as they get from their books. Some of the first girls have married and have nice, clean homes, which are quite a contrast to many of the homes around them. Those who have children are seeking to give them a Christian education. Last year the daughter of one of the first girls was received into the Training Home. Katie Gabriel, who, as preceptress, has so faithfully mothered the school during the eighteen years of its existence, laughingly said, "Now I have received a grand-child."

One of the teachers who was also educated in the Training Home, married a Syrian, who is a missionary in German East Africa, and went with her husband to his labor of love among the poor blacks of that dark continent.

Several of the other graduates have become teachers, some in Palestine, some in Africa. One has a school near Cairo, another teaches at Khartum, in the Sudan. Two went to Brazil and two have come to the United States.

When the school was first opened the parents paid nothing toward the board, tuition or clothes, except to furnish the shoes, and it was hard to get enough girls to fill the home. Now almost all furnish their own clothes, and all pay something toward their board; those who take music pay for their music lessons, and more girls apply for admission than can possibly be taken.

The six day-schools, three in Ram Allah and three can be done in the way of showing people how to live in this life, as well as to teach them how to be ready for the life which is to come.

In 1901 the Boys' Training Home, at Ram Allah, was opened with 15 boys. From the first, this has been an industrial school. In Palestine, a boy is the ruler of the home, and his great temptation is to be proud and arrogant. In his home he early learns to steal, to strike his mother and sisters, and to lord over things in general. So in our school, among other things, they are taught the honor of labor and to respect womankind. They are quick and ambitious to learn, and it is a pleasure to teach them. They have a Christian Endeavor and a Temperance Society.

A GROUP OF SYRIAN BOYS AND THEIR TEACHER, RAMALLAH, PALESTINE.

in other villages, are taught by eight native teachers, who received their education at the Training Home. The children in these schools are taught the Bible, Christian songs, reading, writing, arithmetic, a little geography, to sew and to do needle-work. The teachers also conduct a Sunday-school and have meetings for women and children. One teacher was so successful with her meetings that she has been relieved from school duties and now spends her time as a Bible woman. She has services each week in three villages.

Perhaps, sometime some American Friends will feel called upon to go and live in the out-villages where we have schools. They could help the native teacher and do missionary work in the village. Much

The girls have two Endeavor Societies and a Peace Society.

The Boys' Training Home now has 28 boys, who have been selected from a large number of applicants and have successfully stood an entrance examination. The two native houses in which the school is kept are small and inconvenient, but through the blessing of God, the generosity of Friends in America and the patient labors of Timothy B. Hussey, president of the New England Board, and A. Edward Kelsey, present and most efficient superintendent of the work at Ram Allah, a beautiful tract of over 12 acres of land has been purchased. Plans are being made for a building that will accommodate 100 boys, and the money with which to erect it is being collected. It is, indeed, a good investment and promises to pay well in Christian manhood.

The monthly meeting at Ram Allah is in a healthy condition. It has 70 members and about 200 attend the Sunday services. The house in which the services are held is the largest native room in the village, but it is so small that the morning meeting and Bible-school are both held in two sections.

The natives themselves, with the help of the missionaries on the field, have purchased a plot of ground on which to build a meeting-house, and Friends at Haverford, Pa., have been moved to collect money for this building.

LICENSE OF LIQUOR SALOON UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Decision of Judge Samuel R. Artman, of Boone Circuit, rendered at Lebanon, Indiana.

STATE CANNOT SELL PRIVILEGE TO PRODUCE CRIME AND MISERY.

It would seem to follow logically that this imperative duty can not be discharged by delegating, for a money consideration, to an inherently unlawful and immoral business the right to exist and subject the citizens of the State to its baneful influence. Logic and reason must certainly treat such a delegation of right as a suspension rather than an exercise of the police power. The exercise of the police power can not be suspended or surrendered lawfully.

Blue vs. Beach et al., 155 Ind., 129.

The logic of all this must lead to the conclusion that the State can not, for a license fee, give the saloon business a legal standing.

The Supreme Court of Indiana has, in effect, so held. In the case of the Columbia Club vs. the State, ex rel McMahan, 143 Ind., 110, that court declared that a statute which should attempt to authorize prize-fighting would be void. The language of the court is: "A statute which should attempt to authorize prize-fighting, would, most certainly, be opposed to the spirit of the constitution and, indeed, to that of the law itself, long since defined to be 'A rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the supreme power of a State, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong.' While prize-fighting is odious and degrading, its evil influences are insignificant when compared with the destructive results of the liquor traffic. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the saloon business is the greatest source of crime and misery that there is in any State—more than that, the greatest source in each State.

HIGHEST AUTHORITY CONDEMNNS LESS INJURIOUS BUSINESS.

The position of this court then is this: The highest judicial authority of the State has declared a less injurious business inherently unlawful, and beyond the power of the State to delegate to it a legal existence, and this court is now asked, in the face of this declaration, to hold that the business, which has been declared by the highest judicial authority in the nation to be the most unlawful business in any State, can be given a legal existence by the State, for a fixed consideration. This court will not walk into this dilemma. The law should be harmonious.

In the case of Commonwealth vs. Douglass, 100 Ky. 116, 24 S. W. Rep., 233; 66 Am. St. Rep., 328, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, distinguished the exercise of the police power from contract obligations, holding that a license to conduct a lottery was not a contract, but an attempted delegation of a right, which the State could not grant, because a lottery is vicious and demoralizing in the community. I quote from this opinion the following:

"The reason for this distinction must be apparent to all, for, when we consider that honesty, morality, religion, and education are the main pillars of the State, and for the protection and promotion of which government was instituted among men, it at once strikes the mind that the government, through its agents, can not throw off these trust duties by selling, bartering, or giving them away. The preservation of the trust is essential to the happiness and welfare of the beneficiaries, which the trustees have no power to sell or give away. If it be conceded that the State can give, sell and barter any one of them, it follows that it can thus surrender its control of all and convert the State into dens of bawdy houses, gambling shops and other places of vice and demoralization, provided the grantees paid for the privileges, and thus deprive the State of its power to repeal the grants and all control of the subjects as far as the grantees are concerned, and the trust duty of protecting and fostering the honesty, health, morals and good order of the State would be cast to the winds, and vice and crime would triumph in their stead. Now it seems to us that the essential principles of self preservation forbid that the commonwealth should possess a power so revolting, because destructive of the main pillars of government.

"The power of the State to grant a license to carry on any species of gambling, with the privilege of revoking the same at any time, has an unwholesome effect upon the community and tends to make honest men revolt at the injustice of punishing others for engaging in like vices. We have, for instance, at this day, men confined in the State penitentiary for setting up and carrying on gambling shops whose tendencies are not much more demoralizing, if any, than the licensed lottery operator, who goes free under the protection of the law. The one wears a felon's garb, and the other is protected by license, which he claims as an irrevocable contract because he has paid for the privilege. The privilege ought never to be granted, and under the present constitution can never be. As said, to impress the privilege with the idea of contract because it was paid for might fill the whole State, and especially the cities, with gambling shops and enterprises, protected by contract, and the few gamblers that might not be thus protected and who would be liable to be punished for gambling, would not be, because it would strike the honest man as unjust to punish the poor wretch for doing that which was made lawful for others to do by paying for the privilege."

To the same effect is the holding of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Stone vs. Mississippi, 101 U. S., 814, in which that court said: "The question is, therefore, directly presented, whether, in view of these facts, the Legislature of a State can, by the charter of a lottery company, defeat the will of the people, authoritatively expressed, in relation to the further continuance of such business in their midst. We think it cannot. No Legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves cannot do it, much less their servants. The supervision of both of these subjects of governmental power is continuing in its nature, and they are to be dealt with as the special exigencies of the moment may require. Government is organized with a view to their preservation, and cannot divest itself of the power to provide for them. For this purpose, the largest legislative discretion is allowed, and the discretion cannot be parted with any more than the power itself."

To the same effect in Ritter's Moral and Civil Law, Chap. X.

People ex rel, etc., vs. Squire, etc., 14 N. E., 820, and cases there cited.

In view of these holdings, based, as they certainly are, upon good reason and sound common sense, it must be held that the State cannot under the guise of a license, delegate to the saloon business a legal existence, because to hold that it can is to hold that the State may sell and delegate the right to make widows and orphans, the right to break up homes, the right to create misery and crime, the right to make murderers, the right to produce idiots and lunatics, the right to fill orphanages, poor houses, insane asylums, jails and penitentiaries and the right to furnish subjects for the hangman's gallows.

HIGHEST COURTS HAVE PASSED MIDDLE OF STREAM.

The Supreme Court of Indiana, the Supreme Courts of many other States and the Supreme Court of the United States have already so far passed the middle of the stream upon the question involved in this case that return would now be more difficult than to go over. "Go over" is merely to draw the natural, logical and inevitable conclusion from the declarations and judgments of the courts. To return would mean either to abandon the adjudication that the saloon business is unlawful at common law, or to hold that a business which has been adjudged, by the courts, to be unlawful, at common law, because it naturally and inherently endangers the health, comfort, safety, morals and welfare of the people, may be legalized for money. Some court may so hold in this case, but it will not be done by this court. If it is done by any court, it must be done by the court that has already held the business to be unlawful, because of its inherently destructive effects upon society.

AMENDED REMONSTRANCE SUSTAINED.

With due appreciation of the responsibilities of the occasion, conscious of my obligations, under my oath to Almighty God and to my fellow-man, I can not, by a judgment of this court, authorize the granting of a saloon license, and the demurrer to the amended remonstrance is, therefore, overruled, the amended remonstrance is sustained and the application is dismissed at the costs of the applicant.

MISS CANDACE'S LIGHT.

Nobody ever thought of Miss Candace West as intellectual, but doubtless had any one supposed that she would take literally the text, "Let your light so shine," half a dozen worthy and well-meaning friends would have hastened to try to convince her that it did not mean wasting kerosene oil every night to light the bit of road in front of her house when she could so ill afford to do it.

Miss Candace never forgot the way the command flashed upon her. She had finished her frugal Sunday dinner, and her tiny house being in immaculate Sunday order, she sat down by the window, as she always did, to read her three chapters. She always read the Bible through in order, but it must be confessed that the prophecies and the epistles were a difficult duty. Now she had come to Matthew again, and was reading with the simple, unquestioning interest of a child. And then she came to it—"Let your light so shine before men."

Miss Candace started and turned her eyes to the narrow, unlighted little street before her door.

"Why, I never thought of that!" she exclaimed.

But having thought of it, she never questioned the matter. The only problem was to think how she could save enough oil to burn till 10 o'clock every night. Miss Candace thought till 10 o'clock would be long enough, it was so seldom that anybody passed at night.

So her duty began, and as the weeks passed, the lighting of her lamp became a humble act of worship.

One day the minister's wife called, and learned about the light, and the tears came to her eyes as she listened.

"Dear Miss Candace," she said, "I wish that we all lighted our bits of road as well as you do."

Five years later Miss Candace died. In all those years she had kept her lamp lighted, although, so far as she knew, nobody had ever needed it. She had never thought to inquire about that part of it.

At her funeral the minister spoke of her lamp. It had probably done no material service, he said, but no one could estimate the moral influence of it. As he ended, there was a little stir in the company, and a young woman rose.

"It isn't customary for friends to speak, I know," she said, "but I must. Some of you here may remember me; I was Maggie Anderson. You used to call me wild, and I was. But none of you ever knew that I almost ran away with a man five years ago.

"I knew what it meant, but I was hard and bitter, and didn't believe any one, and I agreed to meet him on a certain night.

"When the time came I slipped out, but I never got to him. Do you know why? I couldn't pass Miss Candace's light. I tried it again and again, but each time shrank back because I felt as if it would show how bad I was, and yet at the same time, when I looked away from it, I was afraid to go around through the dark. It seemed to me as if that light somehow came straight from heaven, and if I crossed it I should be lost.

"I went back, and a few days after that I got to work in Canton. I am married now, and happy, but if it hadn't been for Miss Candace's light—Oh, I wish I had come back and told her! I always meant to some time."—Youth's Companion.

MONOTONOUS WORK.

"I wouldn't mind the work so much, if only there were more variety to it," said a wearied, somewhat discontented woman one day. "It's doing the same thing week after week—the over and overness of it—that tires me so."

Yet over and over appears to be the law of the universe. The sun rises and sets, the seasons come and go, the tides ebb and flow as they have done for centuries. Nature follows a ceaseless round, and the stars that nightly whirl into their places look down upon us exactly as they looked down upon our fathers.

Still, through it all, there runs an endless variety. No two seasons are ever quite the same, and the earth in its ceaseless journey round the sun is yet moving rapidly forward to something, somewhere—a goal unexplored and unknown. The same is true of our busy, monotonous days. They may seem tiresomely alike in their passing, and in the common duties they bring, but look back over the years and see how they have changed. When was it that the careless banging of doors, the tumult of young voices, and the toys scattered over the house fretted you so? There was no definite time when these things ended, but your grown-up boys and girls are done with them now. It is the same with almost all the duties that fill the days—they have gradually changed. The tasks that irked so last year are ours no more, though we scarcely noticed when or how they passed. And the swiftly whirling, slowly changing years are bearing us somewhere—away beyond it all. Let us not chafe at the over and over of life, but view it reverently, care for it faithfully; it is not for long.—Exchange.

Hate is an exhausting passion. It takes time and thought and strength. It has been said that a great hate is more strenuous and passionate than a great love. But it is negative. It accomplishes nothing except destruction and evil. Any young person who makes room in life for a large, active hatred of anybody is committing a fearful blunder. It will crowd out a hundredfold more than it ever can replace, even in its fullest satisfaction; and as a matter of fact, it never is satisfied, and its reaction is forever greater than its satisfaction. Keep hatred out; welcome love in—that will bring strength and blessing.—Exchange.

FIRST QUARTER.

LESSON XIII.

THIRD MONTH 31, 1907.

REVIEW.

Read Psalm 104.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord knoweth them that are His. II Tim. 2: 19.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Third mo. 25.—God the creator. Gen. 1: 1-25.
 Third-day, Third mo., 26.—Man made in image of God. Gen. 1: 26-2: 3.
 Fourth-day, Third mo. 27.—Man's sin and God's promise. Gen. 3: 1-6, 13-15.
 Fifth-day, Third mo. 28.—Cain and Abel. Gen. 4: 3-15.
 Sixth-day, Third mo. 29.—Noah saved in the Ark. Gen. 8: 1-16.
 Seventh-day, Third mo. 30.—Abram called to be a blessing. Gen. 12: 1-8.
 First-day, Third mo. 31.—Lot's choice. Gen. 13: 1-13.

In the lessons of the past quarter we have a sort of picture gallery, the different scenes of which are intended to convey some idea of the creation of this world we live in, and the conditions—especially the moral conditions, which surround men. The teaching is clear that man's nature, that which we call human nature, has undergone no essential change since the earliest days. Temptation is just as enticing as it was in the Garden of Eden, and the results of yielding to temptation are just as sure now as then. On the other hand, righteousness and faith, and the results which flow from them, are just as strongly set forth.

Besides these moral lessons, as they may be termed, the writer has a further purpose—that of tracing the history of his race, of which he was so proud, to the earliest source, and in Abraham we find the great progenitor of the Jews—one of the noblest characters to be found anywhere, and, for the age in which he lived, far outshining any other.

In Lesson I, "God the Creator," we have God portrayed as the creator of all things, who out of chaos shapes and forms the world, and all things.

In Lesson II, is the story of "Man made in the image of God"—a being next to God. We are also taught the place of rest in man's economy.

In "Man's sin and God's promise," we have the graphic picture of temptation, the yielding to temptation, and the consequent suffering. But with the sin is given the promise of One who will be the conqueror of sin.

"The story of Cain and Abel" shows the result of evil thoughts, evil passions, evil deeds. Man cannot help being, in some sense, his brother's keeper. "No man liveth unto himself, and no man dieth unto himself;" we cannot escape responsibility for our influence, as well as for our deeds. "Noah saved in the Ark," teaches God's protecting care, and the blessing which comes from faith with obedience.

Still more, in "Abram called to be a blessing," is seen an example of faith and obedience. In "Lot's choice" is shown the danger of giving up one's life to the pursuit of wealth and worldly advantages alone. In "God's covenant with Abram" we see again the rewards of simple faith and unquestioning obedience.

In "Abram pleading for Sodom" is an example of a generous, merciful heart, longing that no innocent ones should suffer.

In "Isaac a lover of peace" there is a beautiful picture of a man of peace who would rather suffer a wrong than fight, or even quarrel. No greater courage can be shown than by that man who, where no principle is involved, knowing himself to be in the right, gives way, rather than contend for justice. "The meek shall inherit the earth."

In "Jacob and Esau" we have again a picture of temptation to do wrong, deceit and lying lips, and the results of the sin. The "Woes of drunkenness" are graphically pictured by Isaiah. All that he says is, if possible, truer to-day than when he spoke. The only absolutely safe course is total abstinence.

TOPIC FOR FIRST MONTH THIRTY-FIRST, 1907.

HOME MISSIONS: THE PROGRESS OF THE AFRO-AMERICAN.

Ps. 116: 16-19.

Second-day, Third mo. 25.—We are lights. Matt. 5: 13-16.
Third-day, Third mo. 26.—Our country first. Matt. 10: 1-15.
Fourth-day, Third mo. 27.—Expect discouragement. Mark 4: 14-20.
Fifth-day, Third mo. 28.—Peter a home missionary. Acts 9: 32-35.
Sixth-day, Third mo. 29.—The strong help the weak. Rom. 15: 1-5.
Seventh-day, Third mo. 30.—Giving systematically. 1 Cor. 16: 1-3.

The achievements of one hundred years or less, moving from a point of absolute barbarism, is what we have to consider when the present state of the African in America is before us. A high form of transmitted and long-nurtured civilization, embodying a type of morality that is perhaps the most exacting that the world has ever seen, is brought into sharp contrast with the negroes' imperfect comprehension and defective expression of the principles of personal and social right and duty.

Forgetfulness of such facts by the friendly is hardly less hurtful to the interests of the race than is their disregard by the indifferent and hostile. Men of high station who proclaim friendship for the negro declare that he is absolutely without moral sense; while others, from the single premise of his humanity, ask of him and for him the same standards and treatment as if the inheritance of a thousand years of progress were his.

The unprecedented advancement of a race from naked savagery to a forced contact with modern civilization, and, within a generation, to the exercise of the high privilege of self-government, could not be classed as other than a hazardous experiment, involving the darkest guilt in the first step, and an ill-considered political measure in the second. That the results have been other than satisfactory in some of their most striking aspects is only a vindication of the words, "As a man soweth, so also shall he reap"—and if to the wind, the whirlwind. But nothing of this affords any excuse for shirking by this generation, whose duty is measured by the needs of its time, however they may have arisen.

The men and women who have given their lives for the colored race have, in many instances, made sacrifices hardly less than those who go into the dark lands of heathenism, while they have had to undergo an ostracism and persecution that the latter have rarely been called on to endure; and their reward is with Him in Whose name they went out. To say that their efforts have not been or are not always wisely directed is but to give them rank with the rest of us as human. But to condemn every sort of intellectual culture because there are moral shortcomings can but be regarded as unjustifiable, even though it must be admitted that the need is for emphasis on the doctrines of truth, and honor, and honesty, rather than on advanced scholarship.

The lack of a right thrift, of a more highly-developed economic sense, seems to be one of the great drawbacks to the development of the race. Money in unprecedented amounts and acquired with unprecedented ease flows through their hands and leaves nothing but a hurtful habit. To enlarge the circle of his needs by encouraging a higher standard of living, to make him want more about him before he is content with his home, is one of the proposals of the negro's friends; while the learning of a more profound knowledge of the relations between mere religious sentiment and the Christian life—to make him dissatisfied with an emotional activity that leaves the grosser propensities of man unchecked, is a need in which he is not alone among men, though he may have it in larger degree than many.

To claim superior rank or capacity and then to abuse it by taking advantage of the one regarded as inferior, is to betray one's rank and forfeit his claim of superiority.

A LETTER FROM OMAJA, CUBA.

EDITOR AMERICAN FRIEND:

I have been very much interested in the articles published in thy paper, written by the various missionaries in Cuba, but feel that volumes remain unwritten. Cuba, the Pearl of the Antilles, was described by Columbus over four hundred years ago as "the most beautiful land the eye ever looked upon." To-day we see it in many parts just as he saw it then, unchanged by the hand of man, and it is truly beautiful, but where man has fulfilled his command and subdued the land and planted flowers, fruits and vegetables, it is ten times more beautiful, whether it be the hills of Guantanamo and Santiago, covered with chocolate and coffee; the low lands of Banes, with their bananas and sugarcane; the rocky palm-covered sabanas of Holgyn, that are such good places for roads; the parana and Guinea grass lands, where thousands of cattle feed the year round, or the truck-garden and fruit-farm of the American colonist. But, aside from its beauty, it has utility. Our gardens and fruit farms are the most productive in dollars and cents of any on earth. Then, why do we continually hear the cry of poverty and the asking for money to carry on the mission work? Simply because we have not taken hold of what God has given us, and have fallen short in two great commandments. We have not yet subdued all the earth; neither have we preached the Gospel to all people. There are many missionaries in Cuba to-day, but only a very small per cent. of what is needed. The mission boards are calling for men and money to carry on the work. It is true that men are in waiting for the work, but they have not taken hold of God by faith, and are waiting for the boards to send them out. When the apostle, Paul, saw the man beckoning to him and heard him saying, "Come over into Macedonia and help us," he did not wait for a mission board to raise the funds. Man's extremity is God's opportunity. Men have failed in their methods to raise money to send missionaries to convert Cuba. God is pointing to His way in which it may be done. He has prepared a splendid climate, much more healthful than in most parts of the United States, and given us a soil that is more productive and wages higher than in many parts of the United States.

One year ago there were but three or four Americans in this colony. Thirteen months ago the first one arrived; to-day there are about 150, and I am happy to say that most of them are Christians, but I seriously doubt if very many of them came here to preach Christ to the people. About three-fourths are here because the doctor told some member of the family they must look for a better climate. Others came for money, pure and simple, or to make a home. But God is turning all to his glory, and we have regular services by the Dunkard minister and Union Sabbath-school and a public day-school, with an enrollment of about 30. There are about 10 denominations represented here, of whom the Dunkards have more than any other. I think the time is not far distant when they will "pull off" and build a church to themselves, and leave the way clear for others. Who will be next? Why not Friends? We already have three members here, and have an advantage over any church working here in having one who talks the language. All the Christians here are having an influence for good among the natives, by their example; but we can do more good by word and example. Old people can come here to give an example, for their health, or financial reasons; young ones can come for these same reasons, and, if zealous for God, can soon learn the language and teach the people.

A candle by the side of an electric light adds but little to its brilliancy, but put out on the Western plains will light a traveler many miles on his way. So is a life lived for Christ in the United States, where there are many shining lights of the Church, and here, where there are so few.

If any one thinks of coming here for any of the above reasons, have no fears. If you work here with the same zeal as in the United States, God will bountifully provide. Will some one "come over into Cuba and help us?"

Any questions will be gladly answered.

Sincerely,

N. K. WILLIAMS,

Second month 25, 1907.

Correspondence.

THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I was very favorably impressed with the inclosed report of H. R. Fincher's paper. I wonder if it would not be a good item for THE AMERICAN FRIEND? I submit it respectfully.

Thy Friend,

MARY S. KNOWLES.

The Oalswood Seminary, Union Springs, N. Y.

[The following is the "paper" referred to above. It is an extract taken from the pen of H. R. Fincher, Presbyterian minister, Batavia, N. Y.:]

"The outlook depends on one's point of view. My view is that there will be a blending of the old and the new. Not new wine in old bottles, but old wine in new bottles. There will be old positions largely reaffirmed in terms of modern criticism, science and interpretation. There are two ideas of God in our conception of His transcendence. The one as brought out in Harnack's 'What is Christianity?' and the other as explained in Fisk's 'Through Nature to God,' will be brought together in the idea of God in all and God over all. The great poem of the creation of man will stand—'God breathed into man the breath of life, and he became a living soul!' That explains His dual nature—nothing else does. Evolution has gaps. God fills these gaps.

"To explain sin as less than willful choice of evil is to make sin less than sin. With wide and varying interpretations, the Bible stands, and will stand as the book of life; wondrously human and more wondrously divine, 'whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.'

"The outlook for Christian truth is that it will be in form a simple statement. There will be no attempt to state more than we know. The great essentials alone will appear. There will be more Scriptural theological problems. Christ did not explain the nature of His person. Perhaps the world will not try to by and by. He stands the supernatural person, however you may explain His birth or resurrection, although I hold to the old position.

"In the coming creed the Cross will not be torn, as in the past, into doctrinal splinters. 'He died for us' will tell the great work of reconciliation. A simple, practical handling of Christian truth for the pressing needs of the busy age is what the twentieth century promises. The real righteousness of God in all His works and the real righteousness of men, as the result of salvation, will be emphasized.

"Underlying all upheavals of society, all the unrest of the times, all movements tend towards integrity and political righteousness. We see the longing of the human heart for Christ, and Christ is Christianity. All our doctrines find a setting in His life. All our problems will find a solution in His teaching. All our hopes and aspirations for a better world and a higher state of society will be centered in that kingdom of which He is King, whose coming is ushering in for us the glorious morning of a new day."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

In the "Correspondence" column of THE AMERICAN FRIEND of the 7th inst., John C. Thomas offers serious and sound objections to rationalizing views of prayer, and it is my pleasure as well as my duty to support him in it. None may fairly doubt that there is a very wholesome reflex influence of prayer upon the petitioner, and it is perfectly proper to make use of this fact in our thinking. But the instant the petitioner begins to plead with the reflex influence in mind prayer gives place to faithless form, and even the reflex influence is an unhealthy one. In prayer we face as children our gracious Father, the high and lofty One, King Eternal, who also dwells within, to revive the spirit of the humble and the contrite. Our very life is lived in the law of the Spirit of life, which is the law of our new, that is, our renewed, being and the will of our Maker, ever present and almighty, ready "to help us in time of need." In faith we neither seek miracles, nor seek to set them aside; we seek Him and His gracious will, the highest possible good. The best answer of prayer is a fuller revelation of God, whose own Son taught us by precept and by example to pray believing.

All the universe is open to the sincere truth-seeker according to the measure of his ability; but the seers see God, over all, through all, in all; and they take heed that pure religion is a personal matter. The order of nature is so certain and invariable as to give us confidence in the character of the Creator; otherwise faith would be impossible. But the kingdom of God is a kingdom of a living, free Spirit, not lost in the creation, and the man of God is not wholly subject to physical powers and chemical combinations; otherwise faith would die, and our spirits would faint for want of converse with the kingdom of the Spirit and kindred spirits.

God's imminence and His transcendence are co-ordinate truths, both essential to clear conceptions of Him. He is neither too far off to hear us, nor hidden away in our mystical union with Him. We are consubstantial with Him and have finite faculties which, so far as they go, correspond to His own infinite ones. Hence we may consciously, as well as unconsciously, partake of His fulness, the totality of the divine attributes and nature and become complete in all our finite attributes and powers. But this is realized only as we are conscious that the law of the Spirit of life is the law of the free Holy Spirit who effectually moves our free spirits to ask what the faithful Father freely gives in Christ's name. "For through Him we have our access in one Spirit unto the Father," who gives "good things to them that ask Him."

WILLIAM L. PEARSON.

Friends' University, Wichita, Kan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I am in full unity with the expressed views of John C. Thomas, Baltimore, in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, for Third month 7.

The article on prayer that he is discussing, found in a previous number, leaves one in the hopeless, helpless condition of having to understand God in all His workings, in order to receive anything from Him. The new Testament teaching is that not a sparrow falls without notice, and the "very hairs of our head are all numbered," and without knowing how He can answer, we are to ask and trust, and expect. God is in heaven, we upon the earth; we are children, He is our Father. And, as the child is not expected to understand all its father does and knows before wishing its desires known, neither are we, or the most illiterate of his children, required to understand more than our need and God's supply and His willingness to hear us.

ELIZA C. ARMSTRONG.

Plainfield, Ind.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

That the Editor may know how much, and whether his paper is appreciated or not, I will pen a few thoughts. This morning, while I was out breathing the pure, fresh air my mind dwelt on God's wisdom and goodness; how He put the air and water in motion, and the motion is what purifies it, and He has so ordered it for our well-being. Thus we should also exercise our souls and bodies to be in a healthy state. And as I entered my home, I spoke of my thoughts to my daughter, and at the same time read an editorial of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. I said he is not afraid to tell us the plain Gospel truth, regardless of criticism, and this is an example for us. And then I read Theo. Cuyler's piece, under the head of "Has the Gospel Run Out?" But as he explained the Gospel is not in the unregenerate heart; his heart has not let in the life-giving presence of God. It often saddens my heart that there is not more spirituality in the church, so that Christians might build one another up in the most holy faith. But, instead of this, some are scheming to build self up into some coveted position.

In conclusion, I would ask, cease not to publish the whole Gospel truths.

Thy Friend,

EDITOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

The generous donors to the "Famine Fund of American Friends" will wish another final word, telling of the distribution of the sum remaining at the time of the last report in

Tenth month, 1906. The following quotation will explain why we felt justified in using the last sums for the famine orphanage:

"The Sendai Orphanage is an institution in the famine district, which was opened during the famine, for famine children. All of the 250 children came when the famine was worst. Until now the institution has been supported entirely by famine funds. Nearly all the children are sleeping in the same building that is used for school, work rooms and practically everything else. In my opinion, unused famine funds could not possibly be used for a better purpose than this famine orphanage. This worthy institution would be greatly helped if you would send on at once whatever amount you have on hand, or are willing to contribute.

"WILLIAM E. LAMPE,

"Chm. Famine Relief Com."

The following statement of accounts will show that the final payment was made to the above institution, the other 10 yen going to an orphanage in the south of Japan, which received into its home several hundred of the famine children.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

J. O. Binford, Knightstown, Ind., is not enjoying good health this winter.

S. Adelbert Wood, Knightstown, Ind., finds liberty to do some evangelistic work, and is blessed in his labors.

Thomas Woodard is using his talent as a minister in the meetings near his home, Knightstown, Ind., as the way opens.

Mary J. Weaver concluded a series of meetings at Tillson, N. Y., on the 1st inst. Good results attended the services. Some were definitely helped.

Walnut Creek and Northbranch Monthly Meetings, Kan., have recently contributed $46 toward the Relief Fund for the Chinese Famine Sufferers.

Prof. William Carleton Wood, of Penn College, preached at New Providence, Iowa, the 24th ult., and Gilbert L. Farr at the same place on the following First-day.

The meeting at Knightstown, Ind., has been greatly favored by visiting Friends. Luke Woodard, J. Williamson, S. Frazier and Alice Laurence, have all been there.

Albert Copeland, Marion, Ind., recently held a series of meetings at Paoli, Ind. The teaching was good and the church was strengthened. There were several conversions and a few accessions to the church.

On the 17th ult., George Willis closed a very successful series of meetings at Knightstown, Ind. There were about 25 professed conversions or renewals, beside much enthusiasm aroused in the meeting. Similar results are reported from Kingstown, Ind.

We extend our hearty congratulations to our Friends, Charles F. and Rhoda M. Coffin on the approaching sixtieth anniversary of their marriage, which will occur on the 25th of this month. There will be a gathering of their friends at their home, 3232 Groveland Avenue, Chicago, on the evening of that day. There will be many who will wish to send them a word of greeting.

B. H. Albertson, a minister of Haviland Monthly Meeting, recently held a series of meetings at Pleasant Ridge, in the limits of Haviland Monthly Meeting, Kan.—20 sessions in all. The entire community was revived. Six conversions are reported, and six applications for membership have been received.

A very successful revival was closed at South Union, Ind., in Amboy Monthly Meeting, the 6th inst., conducted by Fred. Tormohlen, assisted by Clyde O. Watson. Eighteen conversions and renewals are reported. One of the notable features of South Union Meeting is the considerable number of young people who are following the Master.

Four weeks of revival services were held at Carthage, Ind., leaving the church in a better spiritual condition than it has been for years. The meetings were conducted by C. O. Whitely, the pastor, who worked faithfully both in the meetings and in family visiting. The sermons were especially fitting for the church. There were a number of renewals and some conversions.

Walnut Creek Quarterly Meeting was held at Northbranch, Kan., the 9th and 10th ult. L. Clarkson Hinshaw, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic and Pastoral Work, was present and delivered two very able discourses. He also gave helpful addresses on the subjects of Temperance and Foreign Missions. Anna M. Votaw, a minister from Indiana, was also in attendance and had acceptable service. Her presence was an inspiration to all.

Geo. W. Willis, Ohio, held a series of evangelistic meetings at Webster, Ind., beginning on the 20th ult., and continuing seven days. The preaching was direct and forcible, and was presented with clearness and earnestness. Considerable interest was aroused amongst both members and outsiders. The effect on the meeting and Sabbath-school is seen in increased attendance and interest. Those who have stood faithfully by the small meeting so long are greatly encouraged.

Spiceland Quarterly Meeting, Ind., held the 8th to the 10th inst., was favored with the presence and ministry of Allen Jay. A. S. Frazier, New Castle, was also acceptably present. Nearly all of the delegates reported present. Esther Cook was chosen as delegate to attend the opening of the new quarterly meeting at Seattle, Wash., next Sixth month. Fred. Smith presented the need of Friends for mission work, and a collection of $60 to $70 was raised for that purpose.

The small meeting of Friends in Santa Ana, Cal., has little to report in gains or losses during the year, but the following is taken from a recent letter: "We are all in good fellowship and love one another. John Cook, Pasadena, is our pastor. He comes every First-day and holds morning and afternoon meetings, and it seems his Gospel labors are growing more spiritual all the time. Our city is growing rapidly, and this certainly is a good field for Friends. Homes can be had reasonable, and I will gladly correspond with any inquirers on this subject." T. E. CHANTRY.

A series of meetings was held at Penn College Chapel, Oskaloosa, Iowa, from Second month 20th to Third month 3d, conducted by Richard R. Newby, of New Providence, Iowa. The Friends of Oskaloosa Meeting and the students of the college, co-operated in these meetings. Richard R. Newby was greatly blessed in presenting the Gospel clearly and forcibly. There were several conversions and others made a definite consecration. On First-day afternoon the 24th ult., Richard R. Newby spoke to a union meeting of the college Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., upon "The Claims of the Ministry." The address made a deep impression.

Salem Quarterly Meeting, Iowa, was held the 22d to 24th ult. W. J. Hadley, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, was in attendance and gave the Gospel message in a way that reached all hearts. His presence and help were greatly appreciated in the Doctrinal Conference, Seventh-day evening. The titles of the papers and discussions (as arranged for three months before) were "The Message of Quakerism of the Past," "Quakerism of the Present," "Quakerism of the Future." Some of the points made were "The Spirituality of Worship," "The Equality of Men and Women in Religious Service," "To Create Public Sentiment Against Slavery Until the Slaves Were Freed," "Peace and Temperance." The first paper was written by Anna Frazier, the second by George Bond, the third by Alice Cook.

The ministers' meeting of Western Yearly Meeting, which met at First Friends' Meeting, Indianapolis, Ind., the 5th inst., was well attended and proved to be a time of blessing and profit to all. In the forenoon Ellis A. Myres read a paper, subject, "The Preacher for the Young People," which was full of good practical thoughts and resulted in a lively discussion. "The Doctrine of the Atonement" was the subject of an excellent paper, by Thomas C. Brown, at the afternoon session. Many took part in the discussion of the paper. The association accepted a proposition from Indiana Yearly Meeting to meet in joint conference in Fifth month, which will take the place of the regular meeting at Indianapolis for that month.

A two-weeks' meeting was recently held in Winchester, Ind., by Edward M. Woodward, of Bloomington, assisted by the pastor, Wm. J. Sayers. The Gospel was preached in great power, and with the quiet and dignity befitting an ambassador of the Most High. Deep conviction seemed to rest upon the meeting at every session, and there were many conversions and renewals. Since the beginning of the year there have been 35 received in membership, of which 14 (heads of families) were a direct result of the meeting. The meeting closed with a very large audience, indeed. Julia Winemiller, of Attica, Ohio, rendered valuable service as a worker in the meeting, and her services were much appreciated.

On the evening of the 4th inst., about 70 persons gathered at the home of the pastor at Fairmount, Ind., to attend the first public meeting given by the Church History and Literature Committee. A lively interest was manifest in this, the beginning of a series of such meetings, one to be held each month, for the purpose of gaining better knowledge of Friends, their history, doctrines, and message to the world. A home reading course has been arranged, this month's subject being, "George Fox; the Man, His Environment; His Teaching." A special study class is also being organized for those who wish a more detailed investigation. Friends are taking up this work with enthusiasm, believing that it will help to the establishment of Truth, and to a knowledge why and what our message is to the world to-day. Our correspondent also reports an increase of interest in all lines of church work, and in attendance at public service under the favorable influence of Daisy Barr, as pastor.

The members of the meeting at Tillson, N. Y., discovered that the 10th inst. was the birthday of their pastor, Alice E. Stevens, so a pleasant surprise was planned for her on the previous evening. She was adroitly decoyed to the meeting-house, to find more than 100 friends and neighbors assembled. A large blackboard on the platform, covered with a great device in the shape of a horseshoe twined with roses, and the words, "Birthday Greetings," left no doubt as to the object of the gathering. One end of the platform had been transformed into an attractive reception room. As Alice E. Stevens entered the door two ladies escorted her to an arm-chair in this cosy corner. A table nearby was strewn with birthday letters and cards from absent friends. A joint letter from Friends in East Greenwich, R. I., was read at their request by John MacDonald to the guests after they had, with hearty handshakes, extended their congratulations. An interesting musical and literary program was rendered. At the close of this a fine jardiniere and stand was placed upon the platform, and the clerk of the meeting, with some fitting remarks, presented the beautiful gift to Alice E. Stevens, who, deeply touched by all this unexpected demonstration responded by expressing something of the gratitude and appreciation she felt. Social pleasure and disposing of liberal refreshments occupied the remainder of the evening. The large birthday cake, made by one of her Bible class, was left for the pastor to cut. The wealth of flowers, sent from the "City of Brotherly Love" to grace the occasion, with their beauty and fragrance, may in their sweetness typify the memory of this happy occasion, but, unlike them, it will be unfading.

in a trait of human nature which betrayed itself at the funeral services. If newspaper reports are reliable, a panic was almost precipitated by the rumor that another of Voliva's followers was dying. Dowie had pronounced a terrible curse upon his enemies just before his death. He declared he would bring evil upon them after his departure; and it is said that this afflicted disciple was the fourth who had been suddenly stricken since Dowie's demise.

The widow of Russell Sage has decided to set aside $10,000,000 to be known as the "Sage Foundation," for the purpose of bettering social conditions in the United States. There has been a growing tendency in recent years for wealthy people to leave large sums in the hands of trustees to carry on charitable and philanthropic work, so that the proper administration of these vast sums is becoming more of a problem each year. When large public institutions for relieving distress of any kind become numerous, a new danger is bound to appear. An examination of any free hospital or dispensary at the present time will reveal a tendency on the part of intelligent and decent people to pauperize themselves and families. People who a generation ago would have been insulted if offered alms, now take advantage of such institutions as a matter of course. The "Sage Foundation" is to be used not for creating other public philanthropies, but for promoting a study of the questions of poverty and disease, and for aiding worthy institutions already established which need support. Possibly an extended investigation may develop new methods which will enable us to deal with these factors in our civilization more justly.

ON "THE ROAD."

AND IT'S REALLY LOTS OF FUN.

An Ind. woman solved the food question with good sound reasoning. She says:

"For almost ten years I suffered from poor health, which was plainly the result of improper food.

"I was always drowsy, had headache, stomach trouble, was getting a sallow complexion—in short was simply miserable.

"Yet I did not realize the real cause of my trouble until recently. I have given Grape-Nuts and the exercises in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," (which I found in the pkg.) a thorough trial, and they have worked wonders for me.

"I noticed a change from the beginning. My headache disappeared and at the end of the first week my stomach did not trouble me so much.

"Now, in less than a month, my nerves are strong, and I begin to have some ambition to do things. I have gained six pounds and feel full of life.

"Grape-Nuts food, with cream, makes a delicious dish, and I never grow tired of it. I consider "The Road to Wellville" one of the most valuable books ever printed, for I owe my present good health to it and Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. An ex-Governor of Wisconsin, famous as a story-teller, once rejoiced a company of friends with an account of his experience at a New Jersey clambake. At the clambake there were plenty of people who enjoyed the speech of the Wisconsin man, but there was one serious-minded listener on whom it fell flat.

"I started off," said the ex-governor, telling the story, "by stating that I had eaten so many of their low-neck claims that I wasn't in the least sort of condition for speech-making. At that moment a long-faced old man directly across the table scowled at me, and said, in a stage-whisper:

"'Little-neck clams, little-necks—not low-necks!'

"I paid no attention to him and went on with my remarks. After dinner he followed me out of the hall.

"You're from Wisconsin, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," I answered.

"Don't have many clams out there, I reckon?"

"Well," I said, "we have some, but it's a good way to water, and in driving them across the country their feet get sore and they don't thrive very well."

"Why, man alive," said he, "clams haven't any feet!"

"Soon after that he buttonholed one of my friends.

"Is that fellow Governor of Wisconsin?" he demanded.

"My friend admitted that I was.

"W-a-l," said he, "p'raps he may be smart enough man for Wisconsin, but he's a good deal of a fool at the sea-shoe."

FOOLED THE PREACHER.

A DOCTOR'S BROTHER THOUGHT POSTUM WAS COFFEE.

A wise doctor found out coffee was hurting him so he quit drinking it.

He was so busy with his practice, however, that his wife had to write how he fooled his brother, a clergyman, one day at dinner. She says:

"Doctor found coffee was injuring him and decided to give Postum a trial, and we have used it now for four years with continued benefit. In fact, he is now free from the long train of ills that follow coffee drinking.

"To show how successful we are in making Postum properly, I will relate an incident. At a dinner we gave, Doctor suggested that we serve Postum instead of ordinary coffee.

"Doctor's brother, a clergyman, supposed it was old-fashioned coffee, and remarked, as he called for his second cup, 'If you do preach against coffee I see you haven't forgotten how to make it.'"

This goes to show that well-made—fully boiled—Postum has much the flavor and richness of good coffee, although it has an individuality all its own. A ten days' trial will prove that it has none of the poisonous effect of ordinary coffee, but will correct the troubles caused by coffee. "There's a reason." WHEN 'THE PRESIDENT' GOT STUCK.

An old Harvard instructor was recently telling some people of the time when Theodore Roosevelt was a student in his class. One day young Roosevelt was rehearsing a poem to be recited for public declamation. He got as far as a line which read:

"When Greece, her knees in suppliance bent," when he stuck and couldn't get any further. And he repeated: "When Greece, her knees," and still he stuck. Once more he repeated the four words, when finally the instructor said:

"Roosevelt, suppose you grease her knees again, and then, perhaps, she'll go."—Exchange.

Off with his baby clothes, get him in pants,

Feed him on brain foods, make him advance,

Hustle him as soon as he is able to walk,

Into a grammar school, cram him with talk,

Fill his poor head with figures and facts,

Keep on a jamming them in till it cracks.

Once boys grew up at a rational rate, Now we develop a man while you wait.

Rush him through college, compel him to grab

Of every known subject a dip and a dab.

What We Stand For

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth that makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
And the song of victory.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.
INASMUCH.

BY ANNA T. DAVIS.

O fair was the dawn of that Easter morn,
Warm rays o'er the wide world
beaming;
Most joyful day on the whole year's way,
Hope to the sick soul bringing.

Earth's angel fair all unaware,
Of her part in the day's great soul-thrill,
Tripped lightly down in her pure white gown,
On the way to the grand cathedral.

For a song of praise would the great choir raise,
And a principal part in the singing
Was this girl's voice in the anthem
"Rejoice!" And the church bells were loudly ringing.

"To shorten delay I will turn down this by-way,"
Said the girl as she fastened her roses;
"O, beautiful day!—but stop, what's this, stay!"
A sad sight a dark shadow encloses.

In a great city wide 'tis oft a short stride,
From palace to poor tenement lane,
And a gilded church steeple may shadow the people—
The people it holds in disdain.

There in a small heap as if fallen asleep,
Lay a woman unconscious and faint;
"O leave her I cannot!"—all else was forgot

In the mind of this gentle girl-saint.

In a thin hand was clasped a medicine flask,
Bought with hunger and want's sacrifice;
For love lifts no shield but will itself yield,
And poverty pays this great price.

Just inside on the floor as she opened the door,
Crawled a babe in its efforts at play;
And on a low bed where a faint light was shed,
The sick husband in weariness lay.

With quick thought and hand did courage command,
By fresh lease of strength the woman
she raised;
Restored and nourished a new hope was cherished,
The suffering a risen Christ praised.

Sound of organ and choir died as smouldering fire,
On the altar of worship that day;
Though missed in the choir that glad note rose higher,
That was heard in the shadowed by-
way.

O Christ, truly risen, lead us out of this prison,
The prison of pretense and forms;
O, our hearts new create that our lives imitate
The Bearer of the cross and the thorns.

A TOUR TO SEE AMERICA.

May is a particularly delightful month for travel. Spring is well on with all its refreshing aspects, and nature is never more attractive. California is more beautiful in May than in February; the Grand Canyon, and the Colorado and Canadian Rockies are just as grand, and the expense of travel, in this instance, is only one-half.

A thirty-day tour of the continent, covering the scenic points of Colorado, the Grand Canyon of Arizona, twelve days in California, visiting Los Angeles, Pasadena, Redlands, Riverside, Santa Barbara, Del Monte, San Jose, and San Francisco, and a daylight trip through the magnificent Canadian Rockies, will leave on April 27 by special Pullman train under the Personally-Conducted System of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The round-trip rate, covering all necessary expenses while on the special train, and a number of carriage drives at interesting points, will be only $200 from stations on the Pennsylvania Railroad east of Pittsburgh.

This is one of the most attractive American tours ever projected.

HOW SHALL WE THINK OF CHRIST?

This question comes up for each generation to answer. "Who do men say that He is?" is as urgent a question now as at Cæsarea Philippi in the first century. "What think ye of Christ?" is a query as impossible to be escaped by us as by the Pharisees of Jerusalem. A hundred church councils have wrestled with the question; thousands of learned books have been written to answer it; great doctors have, with a show of wisdom, lectured on it; all the creeds have had an infallible clause on it—and yet each serious Christian has the live question still before him: "Who sayest thou that He is?"

One main trouble always is that these mighty questions which are age after age put to the soul are too often answered in language which the soul does not understand. The issue is confused with words which are dry and metaphysical. For centuries men battled over the question whether Christ was the same substance as God, although not one of them could tell what "substance" was. It is still difficult to speak in simple language about these bottomless questions, so that the wayfaring man sees the meaning of the statement and feels the value of it in his own experience. Let us try.

It is frequently said that there is a tendency to-day among men of thought and scholarship to regard Christ as "a mere man." The charge is made that there is a heavy drift toward Unitarianism, and that Christian thinkers and leaders are taking up the position that Christ was only a model, only an example, only a good man. I do not know a single Christian thinker, scholar, or leader who holds such a view, or is in sympathy with such a tendency. The drift is not in that direction. The position held by the Unitarian leaders three-quarters of a century ago has become unthinkable and impossible to Christian scholars, and is repudiated even by the modern leaders of that denomination.

The first word of our Christian faith to-day is the apostolic word that Jesus Christ is the manifestation of God—Emmanuel, God with us, an actual incarnation. The phrase, "mere man," is as antiquated as the doctrine of the divine right of kings. The very phrase belongs to a type of thought that has passed away. For us, to-day, Christ is the personal focus where the illimitable God reveals Himself in a human face. What we keep saying in the simplest language we know how to use is that Christ is very God, that when we see Christ we see the Father, that what we know of God we have learned from Christ. All that wealth of tenderness and love in God; all the unsearchable riches of Divine Grace; all that unspeakable yearning to share Himself with us and to give Himself to us—all that, we have found in God because we have found Christ. He is God revealed in terms that fit our nature, and in a way that meets all our needs.

But while the modern Christian has discarded forever the notion that Christ was "mere man," and says without any reserve that He is divine, he insists in the same straightforward way on His genuine humanity. The Church has always been more in danger of losing Christ's humanity than of losing His divinity. Those who have opposed the heresy of making Him "mere man" have too often fallen into the opposite heresy of making Him "not-man-at-all." If He did not feel the burden and the struggle as I feel them; if He did not know the tug of actual temptation as I know it; if He did not need to make the hard choices and decisions of life as I make them; if He did not feel the worth of human love and fellowship as I feel them; if He did not agonize in prayer as I agonize—He cannot enter into sympathy with me; He cannot be my Saviour; He would be only a supernatural Being, foreign to my life and unable to draw my heart to Him. It is of all things important to think of Christ as very man, as our friend and brother, who has tasted our bitterest cups, has trodden the reddest wine presses of this life, who has, too, felt the sublimest joys, and the noblest triumphs of spirit. Yes, He is the type and goal of the human race—the new Adam toward whom the spiritual line of march will move for ever.

Very God and Very Man is no contradiction. Christ could not be one without being the other. Man is not man until he finds himself in God, and God would not be God if He stayed shut up in His Godhead and did not go out into revelation and share Himself in love and self-giving. Christ is both God and man, and has showed us in one life that God and man were meant for union. R. M. J.

AN INVITATION.

ONE OF the most encouraging things which has come to our notice recently is a "cordial invitation," just issued by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, "to all who are interested to come and worship" in a "quiet Quaker meeting." The neat, little leaflet, with its modest language, is attractive and becoming, but the significant thing about it is the spirit which it manifests. Either through habit or a diffidence born of fear lest the uninitiated might not understand the friendly mode of worship, or both, Friends have not, as a rule, sought to bring outsiders into their meetings for "silent worship"—not because they objected to having them there, for nothing pleased them more than the presence of sympathetic strangers; but they seldom, if ever, made any systematic effort to reach and welcome them. For this reason it is all the more gratifying to find in recent years a new life coming, and with it a desire to share it with others.

This "invitation," born of a sincere desire for broader fellowship and a true appreciation of the situation, seeks first to explain the meaning and manner of a typical Friends' "meeting for worship," and it is well and briefly put:

Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, when personally upon earth taught the woman of Samaria (John iv : 24) that "God is a spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." In other words, because He is spirit, we must find Him in our spirits; that is to say, in our deeper consciousness, where "Spirit with spirit may meet." There He must be sought after "in Truth;" which means, in sincerity and reality, in accordance with His real nature, not with images or symbols or human intermediaries, but sincerely and directly, as children seek their Father. Thus we must "seek the Lord, if haply we might feel after Him and find Him; though He be not far from every one of us; for in Him we live and move and have our being." "For we are also His offspring" (Acts xvii: 27, 28).

The paragraph on "Silent Worship" deserves careful consideration:

Friends believe that worship can best be accomplished in silence. Indeed, does not the very idea of "Communing" imply quietness and meditation? Our aim is to watch and wait in stillness, and to seek earnestly for the love of God in our hearts; for to perceive this may well be more important for our purification and fitting for life and service than even to hear words spoken by man.

If any cannot find the love and presence of God, will not their true condition be most clearly revealed to them in silence, suggesting to them amendment of life and a more earnest search for the divine? . . . For when we are brought face to face with God, who "Is a spirit," "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do."

And many a worshipper, who in a sense of fear and unworthiness would shrink from public prayer, may here learn to pour out his whole soul before His Maker in secret, and tell forth all his griefs and needs to a compassionate Saviour; thus the assemblage may become united in a rapt devotion and effectual unison of adoration, prayer and praise, even though not one word be spoken.

After a brief explanation of the headship of Christ in the "Assembly," and a word on "Ministry," the invitation concludes:

To bow in lowly reverence and secret prayer before God, listening to his voice; to know Christ Jesus our Saviour as the real Head and guiding presence of our gathering; to proclaim the truth, or offer prayer and praise, in the inspiration of His blessed Spirit; such is the worship for which we plead, believing that this best promotes our spiritual life and the glory of God.

"Drop thy still dews of quietness,

Till all our strivings cease;

Take from our souls the strain and stress;

And let our ordered lives confess

The beauty of thy peace."—Whittier.

Having given these particulars, may we again say that we shall be glad if any feel disposed to attend our meetings, and shall heartily welcome their presence among us.

The most significant feature of the invitation, however, is the ground for its appeal. The practice common among the churches to invite and welcome strangers is well known. Their services are made to entertain as well as edify, and in sending out invitations the features emphasized are those which entertain. The method is not altogether unknown among Friends. It has its place and should be used; but it is time we were realizing the worth of worship, and letting it be its own excuse for being. Deep in every human soul there is a living hunger for the Spiritual, which finds its satisfaction only in the Divine. Other hungers come and go, but this one remains. Why not speak to this condition making our appeal simple and direct. It should have a force, and, when effective, it is likely to endure.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE MINISTRY.

BY MARY M. HOBBS.

There is perhaps no more vital interest connected with the Society of Friends than the subject of the ministry. That there has come about a change of view in regard to this matter must be self-evident to any thoughtful person. I shall not attempt to maintain that we of this day regard the ministry in the same way our fathers did. My only concern is to find the truth in both views, and, if possible, ascertain whether both are not normal developments from the "goodly root" of Quakerism, and whether in our seeming aberrations there is not an organic unity which still holds us to our past.

Human institutions are of slow growth, and in their gradual formation are not unlike the long, geologic periods which have been required to form this earth. Most unlikely circumstances often exert a powerful influence in effecting results which would seem far removed from such causes.

In the study of this subject I lay down one rule from which I shall try not to deviate, and it is this: I shall assume that we have all been honestly laboring for the spread of the Kingdom of God, and that changes which have come about are the result of conditions and not of determined effort. I do this because I believe it is the truth. In studying any subject it is necessary to be more concerned to find the truth than to prove ourselves correct. If we are ever to come to a mutual understanding, we must say what we think and speak what we believe and not try to fence and equivocate. None of us know so much we may not learn more. It is the most ignorant only who have no questions about things continually tugging at their consciousness for answer. Were we to frankly discuss our differences and faithfully express our own opinions, much that seems wrong could be corrected. We need to learn, too, to think for ourselves and not be at the mercy of other people's minds. President Sharpless tells a good story of the old man who, during the long Canadian winters, takes care of a summer camp. The president asked him what he did during the long, cold months; and his reply is very enlightening: "Well, a part of the time I set and think, but most of the time I jest set." I do believe that much of our Quaker trouble has been largely due to the fact that both in meeting and out of it so many of us "jest set" and let other people provide our motive power. This is not a new trouble. Dictators have dwelt under broad-brimmed hats and plain coats and the fashion Friends had of waiting for the head of the meeting to give his opinion and then saying, "So do I," was not especially conducive to the individual development so dear to Quaker hearts.

We have had our share, too, of ignorance, misconception, error, and crude interpretation of Scripture. We have followed the tendency which is old as humanity of loving tradition rather than truth. It is a well-known fact in church history that the heretics of one age have become the saints of the next; and fanaticism, bad as it is, is the result of good intention divorced from sound reason and scientific fact. Instead of clinging to the spirit, we have allowed the letter to lead us astray. As an instance of what I mean, I will recall to your minds the wail of the editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND over the fact that Charles Wagner was simply teaching the belief of the Friends and was attracting multitudes while the Friends themselves had missed the multitude. This is true; but there was a good reason why he gained the attention of hundreds we could not reach. He had a living, vital message for people of this day, and he gave it in such a way that they would hear. We departed from simplicity when we enforced uniformity. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Progression is the religious talisman and we need never have concluded that we had already attained. We began by claiming that we were the true apostolic succession, and though I cannot find that it was ever taught in so many words, the idea was certainly very prevalent that we were infallibly right; that our doctrines and practices were beyond criticism or correction. It is surely cause for profound thankfulness that they were based upon a sound, irrefutable principle; but that we have developed that form, or that our practices have all been exponents of the same, I at least have come to question. Our tenets, as those of all seekers of truth, have been and are being subjected to the sifting processes of the ages and we will cling to the past thus eliminated at our peril.

Let us see, if we may, in what respect the idea of the ministry, as once held, differs from that now held, and then seek the reasons and draw our conclusions.

As nearly as I can tabulate such a difficult matter, it is about this (if I am wrong, no one wants to know it more than I myself). The old idea of the ministry was

(1) The direct call of God to the individual. (2) Waiting before God and communion in spirit the only needed preparation. (3) The direct communication of the message by the Spirit to the minister and his spontaneous presentation of it to the congregation. (4) Non-sacerdotal office. (5) Free Gospel ministry.

Our present attitude I will tabulate thus: (1) The direct call to the individual. (2) Spiritual communion with God, and also earnest, diligent preparation of mind for service. (3) The spiritual communication of the message, carefully thought over and meditated upon, together with a reverent waiting upon God for a fresh putting forth of His spirit. (4) Non-sacerdotal office. (5) Free Gospel ministry, which means not being paid to preach, but supported, if necessary, in order that one may preach.

There is no denying that what was once considered the purely human element is more evident in our modern manner of regarding this matter. The former was more in accord with the mystical idea generally prevalent amongst spiritual-minded people in the time of Fox. This view of life, while containing much essential truth, was liable to great exaggeration and could only, when carried to its logical conclusion, result in asceticism. The fault lay in the old philosophy which divided man into separate, airtight compartments—the will, the sensibility, the intellect; with the body considered as a crude husk to be warred against. Paul himself evidently thus regarded the flesh when he said, "In me, that is my flesh, dwelleth no good thing. The spirit alone was held to be charged with the divine, and the interaction of mind upon body was neither understood nor considered." "The spirit is willing, the flesh weak," was a favorite quotation, and anything which popped into the minds of people while waiting before the Lord was apt, at least by the persons themselves, to be regarded as from the Lord.

The view then held of Hebrew prophecy intensified this attitude. The prophets were regarded as mere amanuenses writing down the oracles of God, which they themselves could scarcely have comprehended. Prophecy was considered foretelling instead of forthtelling, and very many of the prophecies which we know now to have been written after the events, and in so far to be historical, were then believed to have been written long centuries before the events and to have been miracles of foresight. This same character, which they attributed to the Hebrew prophets, they claimed for themselves, and we have all been accustomed to Quaker visions and prophecies, which, after all, never amounted to very much. The great Quaker doctrine of the spirit of God in the soul of man is the most fundamental thing in all religion, and to this we of this day cling absolutely. But instead of limiting the spirit of God to one section of our being, we say, "God in man; the whole man, if he be yielded to God's spirit: not in his conscience alone, but governing in his intellect, enthroned in his will, glorified in his pure, healthy, strong body." Not alone through the sensibility can God talk to His child, but through his reason and his judgment as well. The subconscious life is larger than the conscious, and from its vast storehouse we bring out much which we are unable to explain. But we now know that it is there and can mystify the mystics with psychological experiences. This will explain our altered or extended attitude in regard to mental preparation for the message and for its enlargement and elucidation. We believe that God can use a well-stored mind and a well-trained intellect more effectively than an ignorant mind and an untrained intellect, and we reverently believe that He can inspire a man or woman alone in his study with a message as well as in the face of the congregation.

INCREASE THE NUMERATOR.

BY ELLISON R. PURDY.

Life is like a fraction. Temptations, burdens, duties, form the denominator. Power to meet these, the numerator. There are two ways of increasing the value of the fraction, reduce the denominator, or increase the numerator. We often choose the former. "With fewer trials and burdens, less grinding work," we say, "Life would be complete." God's plan is often the latter. A man recovering from a fever finds his feet too heavy. It is a burden to lift them. Nature does not reduce his feet, but increases his strength.

The Midianites were Gideon's denominator. His courage and faith were no match for their oppression, his fraction was too small. Jehovah multiplied the numerator many fold when he said, "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man."

The giants in the land formed the denominator at Kadesh Barnea, and the faithless spies and faint-hearted Israel gave up because it was too large. "We see that they were not able to enter in because of unbelief"—too small a numerator. "They allowed the vision of the danger and the difficulty to bulk bigger than the vision of God." Caleb said, "Let us go at once, and possess it, for we are well able to overcome it." Had they possessed a faith like his, it would have increased the numerator, and they would have been equal to the task.

Paul's denominator was increased by a thorn in the flesh, and he prayed to have it reduced by removing the thorn. The Lord taught him that in that case He would deal with the other term of the fraction, for He said, "My grace is sufficient for thee;" and from that hour Paul concluded that he, too, would reckon that way, and thus be able to say, most gladly, "therefore will I gather glory in my weakness, in injuries, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then am I strong."

The denominator that confronted the early church was witness bearing for Jesus Christ, "both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and Samaria, and to the uttermost part of the earth," and all that it involved. This denominator could not be reduced, and they were not equal to the task, but the Lord multiplied the numerator, and they received a power when the Holy Spirit was come upon them. Don't run! Don't whine! Don't seek easy things! Trust in God and increase your numerator.

Is the church confronted with worldliness? There is no use waiting for it to diminish. Increase the numerator of unselfish devotion to Christ. Are there fanatical extremes manifest? Then we need more, not less, of genuine spirituality in the church. Let us meet the spirit of demonstration, with the demonstration of the Spirit. Are we threatened by skepticism? Do men by wisdom know not God? We cannot reduce the thinking in the world; we should not if we could. We need clearer thinking, better thinking, sanctified thinking, "Wisdom from above."

I knew a shiftless dairy farmer whose cows produced hundreds of pounds of butter apiece in the year. He used to contend that it would be better if all farmers would reduce their output to about this standard, for then butter would be higher. They would not do it and he starved out, so will the Christian who keeps his numerator small. There are growing needs, growing demands. For a full life there must be increasing faith, increasing devotion, increasing courage. Enlarge your numerator.

AN OUTPOST OF QUAKERISM.

BY MILTON KENWORTHY.

Few institutions of stable nature have had a more rapid growth in our day than the Friends' church and school at Fowler, Kansas.

In the summer of 1905, Nixon Rich and family moved to a newly-bought farm, four miles east of Fowler, not knowing of any Friends in the locality or having a prospect of coming. They engaged in religious work and obtained a minute from Haviland Quarterly Meeting for visiting families and holding meetings as way might open. To one of these meetings, held in a vacant house on their own place, came two other Friends, Albert Roberts and his son, Edgar, who had recently purchased land four miles north of Fowler and removed there from Paton, Iowa. Thus Friend met Friend and felt encouraged. Meanwhile some Friends' ministers, who were looking for a change of location, visited this community and gave their assistance to a series of meetings begun by the Riches. They found here a community needing the presence and labors of Friends, and a land fertile, well watered and cheap. Alvin J. George bought land and soon brought his family. Through notices in Friends' papers and the personal enthusiasm of Friends already here, many more were caused to look this way, with the result that more than 20 families and parts of families have settled in and around Fowler.

There were in Fowler two organized churches, the Methodists and Congregationalists. They had no resident ministers and were not strong. They welcomed Friends most cordially, as did the community at large. Why there are such open doors for Friends may well cause us to consider our inheritance from the past and our obligation for the future—a thought often mentioned in Fowler meeting.

From the first settlement of a Friend's family, even before a meeting was assured, thought of a Friends' Academy began to take shape. It soon found good soil outside of Quaker minds. There was no high school in the county. Fowler wanted one. A subscription of $4,000.00 was carried by representative men from Fowler to Haviland Quarterly Meeting in Third month, 1906. That body not seeing its way to accept the charge, a few interested Friends organized, incorporated, accepted the gift and school opened in the commodious and modern building herewith represented on Ninth month 17, 1906. A monthly meeting had been set up in the meantime, on Sixth month 23d, by the joint action of Haviland and Rose Hill Quarterly Meetings. Regular meetings for worship were not held until the dedication of the Academy building on Ninth month 15th and 16th, since which time they are held in the assembly room.

The attendance at the school this year has averaged about 20, being larger now than any previous term. Board and even rooming for students is practically impossible to find, rates being so high. It is hoped this obstacle to the school may be obviated soon as Friends and others build with this in view. The school is in charge of Prof. H. H. Townsend and wife, who have had long experience in academy work, and are highly esteemed by church and people. They have been engaged for a term of four years more.

Some Views on Present Day Topics.

METHODS OF BIBLE STUDY.

BY LUKE WOODARD.

We find two methods of Bible study spoken of. One is termed, "The old method;" the other, "The modern method." The latter is identical with that which goes by the name of "The higher criticism." Why it should be called "modern" it is not easy to see, for, as applied to the Bible, it has reference to authorship, authenticity, dates, and literary characteristics of the Holy Scriptures. Such inquiries are legitimate, and it is known to every one familiar with the Biblical literature of past ages that such inquiries were employed by believing commentators and critics long before the term, "higher criticism," came into existence. Therefore, it is this phrase, and not the method of study, that is modern.

Every intelligent person who has given attention to this subject, is aware that different persons having the same sources of information, and pursuing this method of study, have reached widely divergent conclusions; in some instances, on matters of highest importance, their conclusions have been opposite. There have consequently resulted two classes, or schools of higher critics—the one termed evangelical, the other, non-evangelical. The evangelical section embraces many of the first rank as to piety, linguistic attainments, and profound scholarship. How, then, do we account for the difference in the conclusions arrived at? It must be accounted for principally, if not wholly, on the ground of the difference in the attitude of the respective classes towards the Bible.

The evangelical school of interpreters regard the Bible, both the Old and New Testaments, as given by inspiration of God; its history as authentic; its record of miracles, as true; its prophecies, what they claim to be, divinely revealed forecasts of future events, some of which have had, others of which will have, an accurate fulfillment. It is well known that the other school of higher critics do not regard the Bible in the same light. In their estimation, parts of it only were inspired (using this word as commonly understood by evangelical believers), portions of its history are simply legendary or mythical, particularly the account of man's creation, temptation and fall; the being of Satan as the prince of a host of diabolical subordinates. They do not believe in the substitutionary character of the atonement, and the future personal coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. Some of the higher critics are yet more radical, and deny the virgin birth, the deity and resurrection of the Lord Jesus; they discredit all miracles, and deny predictive prophecy. This results in a subdivision of the radical school into what are termed the "destructive" and "constructive" critics. But a dim line of cleavage divides the two. The work of the two classes differs in degree, rather than in kind, for both, as regards the result in the minds of those who accept their teachings, are destructive, for that result, in a greater or less degree, is to weaken faith in the inspired word. A tornado may wholly, or only partially, destroy a forest. In either case it is destructive. What other result may be expected to follow such teaching, where it is accepted, as denies the truthfulness of plain statements of Scripture history, and their plenary inspiration? These critics may give us new theories about the Bible, and a new theology, but they are confronted by two facts: First, they do not agree among themselves. Second, their theories are opposed by a larger number of men of equal scholarship.

Where the Bible is the only source of information concerning what purports to be matters of fact, there may be two methods of treating them—one, that of faith, which accepts the record as true; the other, that of skepticism or infidelity, which doubts and denies.

It is sometimes said we should treat the Bible as any other literature, and should approach its study without any bias or prepossessions. This may be true in a sense, but not without large qualification. In the first place, I do not believe that any one living in a community where the Bible has been regarded as a divine revelation can free himself from some kind of prepossession in favor of, or against it. Even many a man who does not conform to its teaching will tell you that he believes it is true. Persons of common intelligence know that it has been a long time in the world, and has been from time immemorial, and is to-day, by thousands of the best and most enlightened people that ever lived, regarded with a veneration they accord to no other book as a revelation from God; that it has been the means of marvelous changes in human society of a beneficent kind.

These considerations, unless the mind is averse to the demand of the Bible on man's obedience, or has imbibed a philosophy that is incompatible with its teaching, will induce a teachableness, and submissiveness, necessary to a right understanding of it. He that enters upon a critical study of the Holy Scriptures, without an acquaintance in his own experience with their Divine Author, and who does not depend upon the Spirit by whom they were inspired, lacks the most indispensable qualification for their right interpretation, "for the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned."

Now it is plain that the conclusions at which men arrive in the critical treatment of the Bible will be shaped by their prepossessions. He who has adopted the theory of evolution, unable to reconcile that hypothesis with Bible cosmogony, does not regard the first chapters of Genesis as true history. The critic who disbelieves in miracles, or predictive prophecy, as many of them do, will pronounce such portions of the Bible as unauthentic legends, or as forgeries. Others, more moderate, will give to some events recorded as miraculous, a naturalistic explanation, and pronounce prophecies which they do not deny in toto only sagacious guesses.

For instance, the book of Jonah is regarded as a pious fiction, or allegory, with a moral, and not as an historical fact, notwithstanding it has all the appearance of a straightforward narration of fact, upon which our blessed Lord places His endorsement, saying, "Jonah was three days and nights in the fish's belly." Was He ignorant, or a deceiver? If an Ingersol sneers and skeptics smile when the Christian avows his belief in the "marvelous" story he may comfort himself in the thought that he has distinguished company—the infallible Christ upon whom, far more than upon His disciple, the scoff falls.

The Bible states this marvelous fact; the man who denies it (and so of other miracles) cannot disprove it. To deny plain statements of fact concerning which we have no information except what the Bible contains, is neither reverent, scientific, nor scholarly. Why should it be thought a thing incredible that a God of infinite power, whose tender mercies are over all His works, should miraculously preserve His prophet to bring a whole city to repentance? It requires no great scholarship to understand such a narrative, and the man of learning knows no more about it than the humble ploughman who can intelligently read his English Bible.

What propriety in Christ referring to Jonah as a "sign unto the Ninevites," if the story is fictitious? or what force in the contrast between the effect of Jonah's preaching, and His own, if the whole narrative is a baseless fabrication? And will there be no men of Nineveh to rise up in the judgment against the Christ-rejecting Jews?

Prof. A. H. Sayce, of the Chair of Assyriology of the University of Oxford, says, in his recent book, entitled "Monument Facts and Higher Critical Fancies:" "There is one point on which we have a right to demand a clear answer from the advocates of the 'higher criticism,' who still maintain their adherence to the historical faith of Christendom. It was to the Old Testament that Christ and the early church appealed in proof of His divinity. 'Search the Scriptures,' said our blessed Lord, 'for they are they which testify of Me.' It was in them that the life and death, the resurrection and the work of Christ were foreshadowed and predicted (Luke 24: 25-27), and upon this fact He based His claim to be believed. Was our Lord right, or must we rather hearken to the modern 'critic' when he tells us that the endeavor to find Messianic prophecies in the Old Testament in the sense in which Christ and His Church understood the phrase, is an illusion of the past. We cannot serve two masters; either we must believe that in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah we have a real portraiture of Christ, or else that Christ was mistaken, and that the portraiture was only read into the chapter in later days." The words of Canon Liddon, in reference to the critical theory of the Pentateuch still holds good: "How is such a supposition reconcilable with the authority of Him who has so solemnly commended to us the books of Moses, and whom Christians believe too wise to be Himself deceived, and too good to deceive His creatures."

Christ lived before the dark ages, when, in the opinion of some of the critics, ecclesiastics "doctored" the manuscripts to make them conform to their distorted views. He had access to the Scriptures as they were read in the synagogue nearly two thousand years ago, and it ill-becomes to question His wisdom or to criticise His interpretations. What an authority He accords to the Old Testament, often saying, "Thus it is written." Hear Him, after He had established His claim to His Godhead, by rising from the dead, as in the walk to Emmaus, He taught His two companions: "Beginning at Moses and the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself;" and to the eleven in the evening of the same day: "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me. Then opened He their understandings that they might understand the Scriptures." Does not such language attest the reality of predictive Messianic prophecy?

We might with propriety ask those who call in question the sayings of Christ, when did the command of God uttered from heaven, "This is my beloved Son; hear Him," cease to be binding upon us?

JONAH.*

BY GEORGE A. BARTON.

"They repented at the preaching of Jonah; and behold, a greater than Jonah is here."—Luke xi, 32.

"I must go send some better messenger."

Shakespeare.

Israel in the early days had thought of Jehovah as the God of that nation only. As late as the book of Micah, we find the gods of the heathen recognized as real deities.¹ Even earlier than that, however, the best spirits among the Hebrews had caught the great truth that one God controls all nations, and that He is Jehovah. Amos is the first to distinctly express this view. Down to the time of the exile even the prophets continued, nevertheless, to think that God cared chiefly for Israel. They represent other nations as existing chiefly as appendages to Israel. The exile brought to the chosen people a closer acquaintance with other nations, and it gradually dawned upon the Hebrew mind that God cared for other nations on their own account and for their own worth, and that Israel was chosen, not that she might be the exclusive recipient of the divine favor, but that she might be a missionary among the nations.

The result of this was the organization of an extensive missionary propaganda on the part of the Jews, for the prosecution of which a considerable missionary literature was created.² Naturally there were many of the Jews who looked askance at this whole movement; in its early stages there were many who opposed it. They thought it was degrading to the supreme position of the chosen people to suppose that anything but destruction could await the heathen. As a satire against this class, the book of Jonah was written.

The author represented Israel as a prophet; because he intended to hold before the nation the idea that God would have them carry this message to the world. He selected the name Jonah because it meant "dove" and would be easily understood as an allegorical allusion to the nation.³ Babylon was represented as a monster which swallowed and cast up Jonah, because the book of Jeremiah had already made that figure familiar to the Hebrews as a picture of the exile and the return.⁴ So this writer wrote his parable to teach, that Israel was carried captive for not doing her proper missionary work, and that after her escape from captivity she did it sullenly and in anything but the right spirit.⁵ When interpreted from this point of view, the book becomes a most interesting missionary tract. It portrays well what a missionary or a missionary people should not be, and by contrast sets forth the ideal missionary character.⁶

It was this feature—the missionary preaching of Jonah—upon which our Lord seized as a sign or type of His own work,⁷ and we therefore have His example for regarding it in this light. It presents as the ideal that spirit of loving service for all the world which was so characteristic of Christ. It caught a little of the spirit of that great commission: "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations," and is a type of that Christlike missionary impulse, which in the last century has heard the cry for release from error coming "From Greenland's icy mountains,

From India's coral strand,
Where Africa's sunny fountains Roll down their golden sands," and has sought to meet the great need in the Master's way—an impulse which must go forward until "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ."

³ That it was also the name of a prophet, may have influenced him too, see II Kings xlv, 25.

⁴ See Jeremiah li, 35, 44.

⁶ The fact that Christ refers to it does not prove that it is not an allegory. He often, as in the parable of the prodigal son, used imaginative material as parables.

SECOND QUARTER.

LESSON I.

FOURTH MONTH 7, 1907.

JACOB'S VISION AND GOD'S PROMISE.

Genesis 28: 1-5, 10-22.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all the places whither thou goest. Genesis 28: 15.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 1.—Isaac sends Jacob to Haran. Gen. 28: 1-5.
Third-day, Fourth mo. 2.—Jacob's vision and God's promise. Gen. 28: 10-22.
Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 3.—Bethel revisited. Gen. 35: 6-15.
Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 4.—"I am with thee." Isa. 41: 8-14.
Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 5.—God a refuge. Psalm 91.
Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 6.—The Lord thy keeper. Psalm 121.
First-day, Fourth mo. 7.—"What shall I render?" Psa. 116: 7-19.

Time.—Uncertain; perhaps about 1800 years B. C. It is impossible to tell how old Jacob and Esau were.

Place.—First, Beersheba, in the southern part of Palestine; then, Bethel, about 12 miles north of Jerusalem.

The story of Jacob's ladder is one of the most familiar of Bible stories—it is graphic, it is simple, it touches the hearts of both old and young. The allusions and references to it in literature are almost innumerable, and it has been made the subject of very many hymns and poems. The most familiar of the former is "Nearer, My God, to Thee;" of the latter, are Longfellow's "Sandalphon," and "Ladder of St. Augustine."

The lesson follows in connection of thought, verse 46 of chapter 27, which, in its turn, follows closely in thought verse 34 of chapter 26, as will be seen by reading them together.

1. "Isaac called Jacob," etc. There is no trace of any displeasure in this account. The reason assigned for Jacob's departure is that he should not marry a wife of the "daughters of Canaan." In 27: 46, they are called "daughters of Heth." It troubled Isaac and Rebekah greatly that Esau should have thus connected himself with the heathen nations.

2. "Padan-Aram." R. V. The meaning of the word is uncertain. Possibly Padan may mean "corn field," hence it would be the corn land of Aram. This was in the northern part of Mesopotamia. Abraham's brother, Nahor, remained there, and thence came Rebekah. Laban, Rebekah's brother. Jacob was to seek to marry one of his cousins. This was quite in accord with Oriental customs.

3. Isaac blessed Jacob. This blessing is practically the same as that which Jehovah gave to Abraham. Gen. 17: 1-8; 22: 15-18.

5. "Syrian." The Hebrew reads, "Aramaeon." See Gen. 25: 20. The verse means simply, he started on his journey.

6-9. Esau, desirous of securing his parents' approval, takes, in addition to his two Hittite wives, another wife, who was his cousin also—a daughter of Ishmael, Isaac's half-brother. These verses are a parenthesis, and Jacob's story is taken up again in verse 10.

11. "A place." The definite article is used in the original as signifying a well-known place. The narrative does not mean that it was his first night out, but on a certain night he reached this place. "And he took one of the stones of the place." R. V. Travelers say that there are many rocks and stones in this locality, some of which closely resemble in shape the Druidical stones of England. "And put it under his head and lay down in that place to sleep." R. V.

12. "He dreamed." Many teachings in the Bible are represented as coming in and through dreams. "A ladder." Rather a staircase or flight of steps. The natural features of the locality may have suggested the form of the vision. It is said that "in approaching Bethel, the hillsides present frequently an exact resemblance to the steps of a stair." "The angels of God ascending and descending on it." Undoubtedly intended to typify the ever and close intercourse between heaven and earth. This beautiful figure is used in John 1: 51 to illustrate "the constant and living intercourse between Christ and God."

13. "The Lord stood above it." The marginal reading of the R. V. would seem to be better here—"The Lord stood beside him."

14. The promise is a renewal of those already given. 12: 37; 13: 14-16.

15. This is an additional and special promise to Jacob. He is promised companionship, protection, and a safe return. Just what the exile, wanderer, and solitary man needed to reassure him.

16. "Surely the Lord is in this place and I knew it not." Like the rest of the men of that day, he believed that Jehovah only manifested Himself in certain places, and doubtless associated Him only with the altars which his father and grandfather had erected, and so he is filled with wonder in realizing that He was here as well.

17. "Dreadful." In the original sense—inspiring dread or fear. He believed it was a place where Jehovah dwelt, and held intercourse with man, and hence great reverence was due.

8. Under the feeling which filled his heart Jacob would naturally set up an altar, and consecrate it.

19. The next thing was to name the place. "Beth-el," the house of God. So Beth-lehem, the house of bread, etc. "The name of the city was Luz." The idea is that the name of the town not far off was at first Luz, but afterwards Bethel became so well known that the name was transferred to the city.

20-22. There certainly seems somewhat of bargaining in Jacob's words, but perhaps it might be read "since God will be with me," etc., I will do so and so. "The tenth." The tithe was a very old custom. Compare Gen. 14: 20.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "God's protecting presence accompanies His worshippers, and He is ever at their side, even when they are away from their accustomed places of worship."

2. "Some folks give according to their means, and some according to their meanness."

TOPIC FOR FOURTH MONTH SEVENTH, 1907.

THE CONSECRATION OF ONE DAY IN SEVEN.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 1.—God sanctified the Sabbath. Gen.

2: 1-3.

Third-day, Fourth mo. 2.—We should sanctify it. Ex. 31: 12-14.

Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 3.—A covenant. Ex. 31: 15-17.

Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 4.—A staunch Sabbath-keeper, Neh. 13: 15-22.

Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 5.—Jesus kept it. Luke 4: 16-24.

Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 6.—The day He arose. Luke 24: 1-7.

The pursuit of pleasure and that of gain are alike responsible for the danger in which the Sabbath is to-day; or rather the danger in which man is of losing one precious part of his birthright. The monotony of a life without Sabbaths would repel most of us, yet it is what many men are compelled to face—and not in heathendom alone, but in most of Christian America in this year of grace, 1907. It is no easy problem to determine how this is to be avoided. The simple life of the country has for a large part of our population given way to the complex, interdependent life of the city, where, if the wheels stop turning for any twenty-four or even twelve or six hours out of the week, some one is bound to suffer. "Works of necessity" seem to multiply, yet unnecessary work may safely be said to multiply even more rapidly; and if with good conscience and right zeal we seek to prevent the latter, ways will doubtless be found to avoid the evils of the former.

One thing is certain, and that is that God places no child of His where he must go contrary to His will; and it is equally certain that what is wrong for a Christian to do is wrong for any other man. The Jewish or rabbinical Sabbath, with its thousands of petty restrictions and baseless divisions between permitted and forbidden acts, has no place in our consideration. Perhaps the Puritan Sabbath of cold and cheerless solemnity is no nearer our needs; but the Sabbath of Jesus, in which it is lawful to do good—which is made a gift to every man, and not man's burden—this is the Sabbath we can accept and apply and enjoy.

Sabbath-keeping isn't a toll that God exacts as a return for the grant of six secular days. It is a high gift from Him to bring us closer to the life that is patterned on the divine life. We need the day for the opportunity it gives the spirit to arouse and build itself; for the opportunity of refreshment it gives the body; for a time when the mind can get out of its work-a-day ruts and channels and move on other and higher planes. It is not a device to give gain to God, but for getting good for ourselves.

His glory and our true success are inseparably bound together. A Christian business man, or errand boy, or clerk, or farmer, or laborer, or whatever he may be, has the honor of God intrusted to his keeping, and God is waiting to be proved by our every act of obedience, to show us that His plans and methods are not out of date, and that His promises await fulfillment along better lines than the necessity pleas of Rebekah or the lies of Jacob—and Rebekah and Jacob may both be in our hearts, unless God reigns there supreme.

QUAINT KINKS IN CUBA.

BY JOS. M. PURDIE.

Practices which are perfectly preposterous to us are perfectly natural to Cubans, and, vice versa, some things current among us are entirely unwise according to the Cuban mind. It is the purpose of this article to see things from the American point of view, although some things may be plainer by contrast. There are practices which tend to show the status of a nation; practices in no way commendable, which give us a clue to the sensitiveness of these people.

Moonlight nights are regarded with fear by those who have had anything to do with fire during the day. Only a few days ago we were in a small town, holding a series of meetings, where this was very evident. During the day we left our lodging in order to invite people to the service and also to visit those who manifested more interest in our work. In nearly every home we found some one ironing, and in one house we were told that they had parched coffee that day. As it was a moonlight night, these people could not go out, consequently, on Sixth-day, ironing day, our crowd was small. If a person must leave the house under such circumstances he takes an umbrella to keep the moonlight from hurting him—a beautiful sight; a man with an open umbrella protecting himself from the silver beams of the innocent moon!

Any little indisposition, or a bad cold, generally puts a stop to bathing and sometimes even face-washing. Some of the Romanists even dare to say that water baptism administered to a child when somewhat sick is dangerous! It is almost an offense to offer oranges, lemonade, pineapple or anything which has some acid in it to a person who has a bad cold. To drink coffee and milk and then eat bananas is a very bad thing. Thus, we could add one superstitious thing to another, but let this suffice to show a few links in the chain that enslaves these people. Superstition abounds wherever ignorance prevails.

Untruthfulness is the bane of this country. The mainsprings of social, political and religious life are in a state of corrosion. Not long ago one of the principal members of the church desiring to make some rules to pay the janitor $4.00 (silver) per month advised us to take some money out of the collection and then tell the janitor that that was out of our own pocket. He added, however, "And may God forgive the lie!" Examples in the social and political spheres have become familiar to us through the war news in American periodicals.

It is a difficult matter to get these people to think seriously on moral matters. They are restless and show much indifference to any religion. Many have found that the forms and ceremonies of the Roman Church are empty, and in dropping these have not discovered the living principles behind them. The wars of Cuba, too, have been powerful teachers of dishonesty. Moreover, the Roman priests have doled out ready-made doses of religion to the people, so that they do not feel the need to think for themselves as to their spiritual welfare. This, doubtless, has caused much of the present indifference and infidelity.

SIMEON.

LINDLEY M. STEVENS.

When years that weary were and long,
Though not by length of days,
But measured by their strivings strong,
Had gone their shadowed ways.

When these, with scars and wounds, laid down
Their record at Thy feet,
Why not, dear Lord, the promised crown?
Was not the strife complete?

Still morn by morn Thy light appears;
Still seasons linger late;
And Thou hast service yet for years,
That still Thy promise wait.

EASTER QUESTIONINGS.

J. LINDLEY SPICER.

"There are no birds in last year's nest."
This may be best,
For there are snow-white spheres,
Full of glad promise, for the coming years.
And from the brood
There may come one, exceeding good.

The future who can tell?
This may be well.
Forth from the guarded store,
Close, mother-prest,
There may come one, better, than former best,
In all things to excel.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I enclose a statement of Isaac Sharp concerning the distribution of funds donated for the starving Russians. I do not know what part of these donations have come from readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, but some $2,200 have come to me for the sufferers in that unhappy land.

I am still receiving in behalf of the Russian and Chinese victims.

Sincerely thy friend,

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

Media, Pa., Third month 16, 1907.

Communication respecting the Friends' Russian Famine Relief Fund from Isaac Sharp, recording clerk of London Yearly Meeting:

Many inquiries have reached me respecting the channels through which the Society of Friends is distributing the funds entrusted to its care for the relief of starving peasants in Russia. These are being chiefly distributed through the Moscow Zemstvo Relief Committee, of which Prince G. Lvoff is the leading spirit. The chairman of the Friends' Committee, Edmund Wright Brooks, who twice visited Russia fifteen years ago for the purpose of investigating the conditions of distress, and also for the distribution of relief, has great confidence in Prince Lvoff and his colleagues, and this confidence is confirmed by a letter recently received in answer to an inquiry as to modes of distribution. Prince Lvoff writes:

"Our organization is of an absolutely private character, and has nothing to do with the Government. We receive contributions from charitably disposed persons: the National Treasury also furnishes us with money which we deal with in the same manner as the private contributions. Our central relief organization, as also our local committees, consist solely of private individuals, and there is no official intervention, only control by the public through the press. . . . In conformity with your request, we can easily keep a separate account of the money that you will send us, and forward it to you. We would use it in a certain locality and send you periodical statements with the names of the villages and the manner in which your money has been spent. We should like to devote your money to feeding the inhabitants of the districts of Menzelinsk and of Beleby in the Province of Ufa, where the situation is most critical. The number of villages and of individuals cared for would depend on the amount sent and the date of its arrival. I may inform you that the cost of feeding one person will average about 3 shillings per month, consequently £1,000 received before March would feed 1,300 persons for five months until next harvest time. The manner in which we feed the people is almost everywhere the same. They come into the kitchens to eat in common, or otherwise they receive rations in their cottages. The ration consists of three-quarters pound of bread and a soup of gruel or of potatoes. Millions of people are now fed in this way. We should like to extend our operations on behalf of children under two years of age, who become ill and die in great numbers. We give them milk soup with wheat flour gruel, from one glass to half a glass per child, which costs ¾ d. per day. . . .

"The Relief Organization has now assumed large proportions, but is not uniform in its operations in all the famine-stricken districts. In some districts it is more extensive, in others less so—this arises from the immensity of the area, and the want of means. The famine-stricken people live only from day to day, and the least delay in the arrival of food brings real starvation.

"We are profoundly touched by your sympathy for the suffering, and your brotherly aid gives us new courage."

The committee is also sending funds to the wife of Nicolai Shishkoff, who is doing everything in her power to look after children, especially in her own neighborhood in the Province of Samara.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Francis K. Jones is now acting president of Pacific College.

Philander Hinshaw is pastor in Mand Meeting, near Cunningham, Kan.

The Friends of Carthage, Ind., have sent $60 to the relief of the starving Chinese.

Achsa C. Kenyon is visiting the families of Haviland Quarterly Meeting, Kansas.

Charles and Alva Huddleson are doing evangelistic work at Sheridan, Ind. Several conversions are reported, and Friends are taking a new interest in church work.

The quarterly meetings of Western Yearly Meeting are being favored by the presence of Luke Woodard, Murray S. Kenworthy, Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame, Elizabeth Frame and other ministers.

Lewis E. Stout, superintendent of evangelistic work in Western Yearly Meeting, is quarantined at his home on account of diphtheria in his family, and has been compelled to cancel some of his engagements.

Willis Bond and Calvin Bray have just closed a two weeks' meeting at Hazelwood, Ind., with good results. Many were definitely blessed, and the whole community was brought to a sense of danger in living without God.

A letter from Burr Oak, Kan., informs us that a revival, lasting for fifteen days, in Oak Creek Meeting, closed the 4th inst. Nathan Ridgeway and Franklin Walker were the chief workers. Thirty-five were converted and twenty-six united with Friends.

Haviland Quarterly Meeting, held at Haviland, Kan., from the 8th to 10th inst., was well attended. President Edmund Stanley and Prof. J. Edwin Jay, of Friends' University, and Achsa C. Kenyon, Baxter Springs, and Samuel A. Jackson, Buffalo, Kan., were present.

Mary J. Weaver, Batavia, N. Y., has recently spent several weeks holding meetings and visiting families within the limits of Cornwall Quarterly Meeting, N. Y. Most of the meetings are in the country, and sickness and storms have interfered with the attendance, but there has been much to encourage. The large attendance at monthly meetings, and the great number of young people who were present, and are really interested, promise well for the future of the quarterly meeting.

Pacific College is enjoying a very successful year in the various lines of college activity. On Third month 2d an inter-collegiate debate was held, in which a team from the State Normal School at Monmouth met a team from Pacific College. The result was a complete victory for the latter, the three judges giving a unanimous decision. Throughout the entire debate the team from Pacific College not only gave evidence of better preparation for the debate, but also it was clearly manifest that they possessed a superior general training.

These victories were not the result of a spasmodic effort of a few weeks, but were won by students who have worked faithfully for years. Of the thirteen State Oratorical Contests which have been held in Oregon, Pacific College has won first place five times. This in competition with the State institutions with their much larger attendance, gives Pacific College a recognized standing in Oregon as an institution which demands the highest grade of work from its pupils.

Fremont B. Milner, Leesburg, Ohio, has just closed a series of meetings at New Hope, one of the meetings belonging to Center Monthly Meeting, Wilmington Yearly Meeting. The meetings at this place continued five weeks. Forty-two conversions and renewals are reported, and seventeen united with Friends. Fremont B. Milner has labored during the winter in the other two particular meetings belonging to Center Monthly Meeting. As a result, ninety-one have united with Friends, and more than one hundred have professed conversion or renewal.

On the 8th of Third month the State Intercollegiate Oratorical Contest of Oregon was held at McMinnville, Ore. This organization includes all the institutions of higher education in Oregon. Katherine Romig, the representative from Pacific College, was the winner by the largest margin ever obtained by a contestant in this State. It reflects great credit to the college as Katherine Romig has received her education almost entirely at this institution, having entered a few years ago as a preparatory student. The only training in oratory which she has received was given her by Prof. W. C. Woodward, a member of the Faculty, while some of her competitors had taken special courses in oratory.

The services of John Marcussen, who visited Centre Monthly Meeting, Pennsylvania, in the love of the Gospel, with a minute from Denmark Yearly Meeting, were most helpful and strengthening to the few who were brought in touch with him. This privilege was denied to many who were prevented by various causes from meeting with him. He was entertained in the home of Rebecca V. Pugh and her sisters, and in their parlor he gave several Bible readings, which were most interesting. He visited several families, and among others one sick Friend (not a member of Center Meeting), and paid a visit to our jail. In these visits comforting words were spoken, and kindly received.

Denver Quarterly Meeting was held at Colorado Springs, Colo., the 1st to 3d inst. It was a very helpful session to the local meeting, and an interesting occasion to all who attended. Good delegations were in attendance from Denver and Boulder, and three, E. Howard Brown, Dr. C. R. Dixon and Charles E. Lewis, were present from Paonia—nearly four hundred miles across the mountains. Among other interesting matters that came before the quarterly meeting was a request from Paonia Monthly Meeting for a quarterly meeting for the western slope Friends, to be known as Paonia Quarterly Meeting, the distance between the two sections of the work being so great that the present organization of the work seems quite impracticable. The quarterly meeting favored the proposition and directed it to be forwarded to the Iowa Yearly Meeting held in Eighth month next. On Seventh-day evening of the quarterly meeting, E. Howard Brown, Paonia, gave an illustrated peace lecture, which was well received by the large audience. He gave the lecture also at Denver and Boulder.

The Richmond Palladium recently re-published an article from the Earlhamite, giving a description of Earlham's new buildings, the library and dormitory. The new library is the result of a donation of $30,000 from Andrew Carnegie, plus the same amount from other contributors. The building will be 100 x 60 feet, ground floor, consisting of bricks with stone trimmings. When completed the stack room will have a holding capacity of 60,000 volumes. The building will also furnish a large lecture room, an art hall, and rooms for reading and study. The new dormitory is to be named in honor of Edwin S. Bundy, deceased, and will cost, when completed, about $50,000. It is to be "H"-shaped—the greatest length being 555 feet, and the greatest depth 106 feet. On the first floor the parlors, on each side of the main entrance, will be fitted with folding doors, as will also the assembly room. Thus this whole space can be thrown into one large room for receptions and other social affairs. The assembly room is to be the home of the Y. M. C. A., and will serve for all kinds of boys' meetings.

New York City is to have a new organization for the abolition of child labor. In speaking of it, Bishop Potter said that the movement was part of a national one, and expressed the hope that the organization would succeed in arousing public sentiment, without which legislation would be of no use.

At a dinner given by Senator DuPont,

GODD NATURED AGAIN.

GOOD HUMOR RETURNS WITH CHANGE TO PROPER FOOD.

"For many years I was a constant sufferer from indigestion and nervousness, amounting almost to prostration," writes a Montana man.

"My blood was impoverished, the vision was blurred and weak, with moving spots before my eyes. This was a steady daily condition. I grew ill-tempered, and eventually got so nervous I could not keep my books posted, nor handle accounts satisfactorily. I can't describe my sufferings.

"Nothing I ate agreed with me, till one day, I happened to notice Grape-Nuts in a grocery store, and bought a package, out of curiosity to know what it was.

"I liked the food from the very first, eating it with cream, and now I buy it by the case and use it daily. I soon found that Grape-Nuts food was supplying brain and nerve force as nothing in the drug line ever had done or could do.

"It wasn't long before I was restored to health, comfort and happiness. Through the use of Grape-Nuts food my digestion has been restored, my nerves are steady once more, my eyesight is good again, my mental faculties are clear and acute, and I have become so good-natured that my friends are truly astonished at the change. I feel younger and better than I have for twenty years. No amount of money would induce me to surrender what I have gained through the use of Grape-Nuts food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Delaware, to the Republican members of the General Assembly, liquor was excluded from the bill of fare. Not long ago the newly elected Senator, Richardson, gave a dinner without the accustomed beverage, and it is gratifying to know that his colleague is following his example.

The Pullman Co. has recently constructed a model steel sleeping car which is undergoing inspection by railroad officials. It is hoped that it may prove less dangerous in case of accident than the older models. Although the principal parts of the car are of steel, some interior parts are of brass and aluminum. There are two shells, between which is an asbestos lining. Air spaces are left, which, it is believed, will render the car cooler in summer than those of the old variety. The weight is slightly greater than that of wooden cars, but this will be cut down. The car attached to an engine and run into a bumper at Pullman at the rate of 30 miles an hour withstood a wreck test that shattered a wooden car. The Pullman Co. are erecting a factory at Pullman for the exclusive construction of the steel cars.

The Oklahoma constitutional convention finally drafted a scheme of government which will be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, Eighth month sixth. Among the provisions incorporated in this document are the following:

Initiative and referendum.
 Direct vote for State officers and United States senators.
 No succession in State offices.
 Most stringent prohibition law of any State in the Union.

State railway commission.
 Two-cent railroad passenger fare.
 Railroads prevented from owning coal lands.

Fellow servant law.
 Commission to negotiate for purchase segregated mineral lands.
 Compulsory and separate school system.

A popular theme in the newspapers of the day is "graft." Much of it is talk published for effect, but the investigations now going on at Harrisburg concerning the construction of the new capitol building, is revealing "graft" beyond belief. Scarcely a stone in the building is the kind called for in the contract. What was supposed to be mahogany is found to be painted putty. Glass supposed to be imported from Europe was all manufactured in this country. Chandeliers supposed to be gold-plated are made out of brass, without any gold whatever. The rostrum, costing $90,000, was sublet and constructed for $2,000; and painting worth $164,000 cost $78,000, and so on through nearly the entire list of expenses. Every item shows "graft" of the most gigantic proportions.

In commenting upon the matter, the Public Ledger says: "When whole schedules covering expensive contracts let to favored bidders, run to a profit of more than 400 per cent., and when important items covering large sums rise to a profit of 4,000 per cent., the exhibition is enough to stagger anybody." Nor is this the saddest part of the affair. The public might forgive those who charge them four or five prices for an article, providing it is what it is represented to be, and of good quality; but when $13,000,000 have been spent on a building which will need constant repairing, and cannot survive for more than a few years at best, the crime is likely to be remembered against the offenders.

The recent wrecking of the much-advertised "Helicon Home" by the explosion of a bomb is the occasion for considerable comment concerning the social experiment undertaken by the author and reformer, Upton Sinclair. We believe schemes of co-operation are yet to be devised which will enable us to live together with our modern inventions much more harmoniously and advantageously than by our present methods; but a few fundamental principles must not be overlooked. They are well put in a recent editorial in the Public Ledger:

"Flats and apartment houses are filled with tenants. They are blessed refuges, no doubt, for people of means without children; but the co-operative home, and especially the co-operative home where children abound and in which the aim is to avoid the cares of life, is an idle dream. They want to erect the building without the intelligence and labor, to grow the oak without the years of sunshine and rain, and to make the home without the struggle. It is all impossible.

It is impossible to get these things for nothing. Money may be got by fraud and guile; it is possible to cheat old fame; the commercial flying machine is thinkable; machinery abridges many

SEA-ROVER'S REMEDY

POSTUM COFFEE AND ITS POWER TO REBUILD.

The young daughter of a Government officer whose duties keep him almost constantly on board ship between this country and Europe, tells an interesting tale of the use her father made of Nature's food remedy to cure an attack of malarial fever:

"Father recently returned from a long sea-trip, bed-ridden and emaciated from an attack of malarial chills and fever," she writes. "In such cases people usually dose themselves with medicines, and we were surprised when he, instead of employing drugs, proceeded to devote himself exclusively to Postum Food Coffee, of which he has long been fond. He used two or more cups at each meal, drinking it very hot, and between meals quenched his fever-engendered thirst at all hours of the day and night from a supply we kept ready in the water-cooler. For several days his only drink and sometimes his only food was Postum Coffee, hot or cold, according to the moment's fancy.

"Within a day or two his improvement was noticeable, and within a week he was a well man again, able to resume his arduous occupation.

"He first began to drink Postum Food Coffee several years ago, as a remedy for insomnia, for which he found it invaluable, and likes it so much and finds it so beneficial that he always uses it when he is at home where he can get it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. While this man uses Postum as a remedy, it is in no sense a medicine but only food in liquid form. But this is nature's way and "There's a reason." See the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

WHERE HE DREW THE LINE.

Arthur Herkimer, the Missouri historian, says the Washington Star, told at a dinner in St. Louis a story about the famous governor, Claiborne F. Jackson.

"Jackson," he said, "married, one after another, five sisters. The thing is incredible, but it is a fact.

"When for the fifth time Claiborne Jackson broached a marital proposition to his father-in-law the old man was eighty and quite deaf. This is the conversation that ensued:

"I want Lizzie."

"Hey?"

"I want you to give me Elizabeth."

"O, you want me to give you Elizabeth, do you? What for?"

"For my wife."

"For your wife?"

"I want to—marry—Lizzie."

"O, yes. I hear you. You needn't rouse the neighborhood."

"Well, do you consent?"

"Yes, I consent," said the old man. He shook his head, and added slowly:

"Yes, you can have her. You've got 'em all now, my boy. But for goodness sake, if anything happens to that poor misguided girl, don't come back here and ask me for the old woman."

IN A SHADOW.

INVETERATE TEA DRINKER FEARED PARALYSIS.

Steady use of either tea or coffee often produces alarming symptoms, as the poison (caffeine) contained in these beverages acts with more potency in some persons than in others.

"I was never a coffee drinker," writes an Illinois woman, "but a tea drinker.
I was very nervous, had frequent spells of sick headache and heart trouble, and was subject at times to severe attacks of bilious colic.

"No end of sleepless nights—would have spells at night when my right side would get numb and tingle like a thousand needles were pricking my flesh. At times I could hardly put my tongue out of my mouth and my right eye and ear were affected.

"The doctors told me I was liable to become paralyzed at any time, so I was in constant dread. I took medicine of various doctors and no end of patent medicine—all to no good.

"The doctors told me to quit using tea, but I thought I could not live without it—that it was my only stay; I had been a tea drinker for twenty-five years;
was under the doctor's care for fifteen.

"About six months ago I finally quit tea and commenced to drink Postum.

"I have never had one spell of sick-headache since and only one light attack of bilious colic. Have quit having those numb spells at night, sleep well and my heart is getting stronger all the time."

sider the advisability of, and possibly draft a plan for the union of the two

It is encouraging to find that the British Prime Minister, Henry Campbell-a scheme for the reduction of armaments. In a recent article in The Nation he expresses the opinion that it is a fit subject for the Hague Conference to consider, and argues strongly in favor of the scheme.

Sales of religious books, and particularly the Bible, in Brooklyn, have received an unusual impetus during the last thirty days. Prominent book men attribute the boom in the religious literature market to the wonderful wave of religious awakening which has been witnessed in Brooklyn under Gipsy Smith and other evangelists.

most picturesque figures at The Hague being at the time Russian Ambassador in London, a position which he continued to hold until 1902.

THE LIFE OF FOUR DIMENSIONS.

No loftier prayer has ever come from a man's heart than the one which rises from Paul in the Ephesian epistle. It comes to the highest point in the words, "that ye may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, and be filled unto all the fullness of God." In these days of excitement over theological issues, when feeling is apt to color our view and we are in danger of being handicapped with half truths, it will do us good to feel the sweep of these four dimensions, and "comprehend with all saints" what a real Christian life means, what the measurement of a true man is.

The length of a life is measured not by the years it lives through, but by the goal it is stretching toward. We discover the length of a man's life when we hear him say, "This one thing I do;" "For this cause was I born"—when we see what is the animating purpose, the ground swell, of all his striving. It is not so important what profession he chooses, as it is what he uses his profession for—what he is aiming to make his life reach. This farthest reach of the life grows as we live, but a person must have some sort of revelation of the true length of life, if he is to be a person of power.

The breadth of life is measured by the width of our interests and sympathies. There are men who have length and no breadth. They are so eager to achieve some task, to attain some goal, that they live only for that one distant point on the horizon. The needs of the next door neighbor do not touch them; the evils which threaten the social fabric make no impression upon them; they are callous to the pain and tragedy of the great human brotherhood. However long their reach, they are still very narrow. Nobody can have a great life until he has wide sympathies, a large spirit of fellowship, multitudinous interests. When you hear one say, "for their sakes I sanctify myself," you discover the breadth of that life.

The depth of a life is measured by its moral convictions. There are lives that have great length and much breadth, but very little depth. They have achieved some vast ambition and they have shown wide interests, but they lack that great reach of the life down into the bedrock of the moral universe. They have not sunk their pillars down to the immovable granite. Perhaps the depth is measured, still more truly, by our power to endure and suffer. The tested life is the deep one. We discover how deep a person is when we find out how much pain and sorrow he can absorb and still go on joyously with his life. What a revelation of depth there is when, for the joy that is before Him, our Saviour endures the cross! And, lastly, the height—the upward reach! Here, if anywhere, we get out of space into the fourth dimension.

"In the air which 'round thee bends, Another Real thy real subtends."

The height of a life is measured, not by our enjoyment of the sky and the stars, but by our enjoyment of God and by the way in which the windows of our soul look forth upon the eternal. He who has learned to pray and in his reach of soul has learned to find a Heavenly Friend has a height of life which no earthly measuring rod can span. While at his simplest tasks he may sit in heavenly places, and, even though the waterspouts may break, he may still be filled unto fullness with God. You discover the Saviour's height when you hear Him say, "I in Thee and Thou in Me—perfect in one."

How shall we come to a life of these four dimensions? Not, surely, by quarreling over opinions and differences; not by charges and counter charges. The first condition is to "become rooted and grounded in love," so as to "comprehend" not with our little party, but with all Christian disciples, what is the measurement. And as we go back up the stream of this great prayer we come upon another secret—"that Christ may dwell in your heart." It is just there, in Him, that the real scope and sweep of life is discovered. The "measure of the stature of Jesus Christ" is the perfect measure of a life. And the final motive power is disclosed in the words, "strengthened with might by His power in the inner man," which take us up to the Father of the whole family. R. M. J.

A SERMON FROM THE SILENT YEARS.

Did you ever close your New Testament after reading the life of Jesus with a feeling that we could know but little of His earthly career? The Gospels, as we have them, seem very brief, indeed. A few stories of His birth, a single glimpse at His boyhood, and His appearance among those who throng about John the Baptist are all we have for an introduction. He takes up the burden of the wilderness preacher, and for three years is much before the public, yet the stories which come to us from this part of His life are only fragmentary sketches of His great moments. An incident at a wedding feast, an afternoon by the sea, a lesson by the wayside, or a scene in the temple, or by a grave, are described so briefly that we can scarcely fit them into a general scheme of His life. Here and there we have a fragment of a discourse or a short prayer, all beautiful, simple and pure, appealing so to the deepest needs in our lives that we are made to wonder why we do not have more of them. The records tell only a small part of the story of that great life—just a beginning of the things which Jesus did. "If they should be written every one," says John, "I suppose that even the world itself would not contain the books that should be written." The greatest life this world has ever known, yet the greater part of it is hidden from us. If we could only lift the curtain which veils His little home in Nazareth or stand by His side a day in the carpenter shop, how eager we would be, but we cannot. Long ago those who knew Him thus passed away, leaving us only here and there a brief text to hint at the things which fill up the great silent spaces.

But these silent spaces have a message for us, since they have their parallels in our own lives. Our great moments come but seldom, and have between them great stretches of the common-place—times when we plod the dusty road with nothing to disturb our onward tread. Little comes into our lives to make one day stand out from the others, and most of them are forgotten even by ourselves. Bright spots here and there and shadows now and then, fix our attention and are likely to assume undue importance; but they are not the greatest nor the most important parts of life. It is in the dead levels of experience that the real fiber of life is made or destroyed. The great moments are only flashes when that fiber is revealed. Why do we prize so much the service of the learned physician, or the counsel of a wise attorney? Certainly, it is not the short prescription, or the few brief words of a moment that we value, but the experience of years which he can bring to bear upon that moment. We make or unmake ourselves in the common-place—in the long runs. It is what we have been and what we are that counts in a crisis.

We are prone to become weary of the grind of every-day life, because it seems so unimportant, and to seek out wider fields for action, where crucial moments are multiplied. It is a tendency away from the ideals of the "simple life," a tendency which undermines the home and domestic contentment, but a tendency against which the sermon of the "silent years" is a protest. Listen for a moment to the heavenly voice which welcomes Jesus from the quiet of Nazareth, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased." It is not alone a prophecy, but a benediction of the Father upon private life, which should teach us the true value of the common-place.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Friends everywhere should be thankful for the great opportunity for service in the cause of truth that has come to our friend, J. Rendel Harris. As our readers probably know, he is president of the Free Church Council, which is a federation of all, or nearly all, the non-conformist denominations in England. He has recently delivered the annual presidential address, which has been commented upon by all the religious, and by most of the secular journals in Great Britain. A writer in the Free Church Chronicle gives three reasons for the choice of J. Rendel Harris to fill this position of distinction:

"In the first place, our Free Churches do not possess a scholar of higher standing or of wider reputation; in the second place, not one of our religious leaders has given the Federation movement more cordial, constant, or effective support, for Dr. Harris has been an active member of the Executive Committee ever since the Council was constituted at Nottingham; in the third place, there is not one of the constituent denominations to which the National Council owes a deeper debt of gratitude for timely and generous help, and for practical sympathy and co-operation than to members of that community with which Dr. Harris is associated—the Society of Friends; so that in electing him to the presidential office as a representative of that Society, this debt, though not discharged, is, at least, gratefully recognized."

In spite of a strong public sentiment favoring such a measure, and a majority of the Representatives pledged to support it, an effective Local Option Bill failed to reach a vote in the present Pennsylvania Legislature. The obstacle in the way was a hostile Law and Order Committee. A Local Option Bill, introduced into the House by Representative Craven, was referred to the committee, which returned a negative recommendation by a vote of fourteen to three.

in order to overcome this action and get the measure before the Assembly, a majority of 104 votes were necessary, and the final vote stood 96 favoring and 9 against. The occasion was one of the most exciting of the whole session, and revealed a situation, which has a bright as well as a dark side. There can no longer be any question that a large majority of the best citizens of Pennsylvania desire more stringent temperance legislation, and that they are prevented from securing it by the political manipulation of the leaders. This condition of affairs cannot continue indefinitely—the voice of the people must be heeded sooner or later.

Each year our law-making bodies are coming more and more to recognize what is sometimes called the "church vote." In referring to the matter, Representative Craven said: "I have heard sneers at the church vote. Is the Republican party so well grounded in popular approval that it can sneer at the church vote? Is it so proud of its recent history that it can defy the moral and religious sentiment of this State? As a Republican, I warn you that you cannot." To no single agency can we attribute more credit for this hopeful change than to the Anti-Saloon League, which has been most effective in promoting and organizing the moral sentiment of the Christian people. This was evidenced in a peculiar way by the chairman of the Law and Order Committee attempting to justify the action of his committee by asking to have a letter read, which was nothing more nor less than a personal attack upon the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, S. Edgar Nicholson. We cannot commend such a procedure, but it is an indirect tribute from the enemy which indicates the source of their alarm.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE MINISTRY.

BY MARY M. HOBBS.

Our attitude toward Bible prophecy has had an effect upon our conceptions of our own part in the great drama of life. We know that so far from being mere amanuenses, writing what they themselves did not know, that the Hebrew prophets were the most intelligent, farsighted men of their time; that they were not hermits, but men of intense lives, well-acquainted with their own and the history of the surrounding nations; that they were statesmen, thoroughly conversant with the movements of other nations in their own day, and that they spoke directly to the conditions of the people of their own time. The Hebrew people seem to have been more responsive to the voice of God than others, but His spirit was at work in Roman law and Greek culture and art, and "wherever through the ages rise the altars of self-sacrifice."

In the books of the Bible we see God using men to do what they were prepared to do. Doubtless His spirit had given Moses the learning of the Egyptians and the culture of Pharaoh's court, but he had it before he became Israel's leader and the law-giver of all time. He had it as Beselel had his power to fashion beautiful things in brass before he was called of God to help build the tabernacles. So with every single man or woman who exerted an influence in Hebrew history. They did not spring full-armed like the heathen, Minerva, from the brain of Jove, but they had toiled in harmony with the divine will and were ready for their commission when the crisis arrived. Joshua was trained under Moses, not called haphazard from the people. The whole people were in training and the most responsive souls were the ones who executed God's will. Having been faithful in little, they were made rulers over more and this is an inexorable law.

Now, it seems to me that all of this is a change in attitude or conception only from the teachings of the early Friends, and not a change of principle. It is their theory worked out more fully. It is quite different from very much of the more recent teaching, which has been a clear-cut departure from the belief of the founders of the Society.

One other notion, I will not call it a belief, for I do not know that it was ever formulated, which has influenced our ministry very largely has been the constant and reiterated teaching, direct and implied, that only those who can "speak to states," who see visions and have strange psychic experiences are qualified to become Quaker preachers. George Fox himself was a remarkable instance of a psychopath. He had what we call second sight, and not a few of his actions were determined by this peculiarity, which he evidently considered a divine power. From his day on this ability has largely determined Quaker preaching. Those who had it told their experiences and related such marvelous leadings that those of us who were simply plain matter-of-fact folk inevitably concluded that, since we had no such experiences, the little promptings we did have to go out to seek and save were most likely nothing but "creaturely activity," which was nothing short of beelzebub. I have studied this thing closely, and this is my conviction. This gave us the strong mystic element which predominated for many years. It also led into the fanaticism which attended so much of the revival work, and it leaves its trail over us in this day in those who will not hearken to the counsel of their friends as to their communications in meeting, and is a fruitful source of trouble.

While we know that many such persons have made most powerful preachers and that this ability, controlled by a dedicated spirit, may be used in really marvelous ways, we also know past any question that it is not a safe guide; neither is it a religious attribute. Many instances of its possession by ungodly persons are well known, and were those persons who have followed its guide as honest in reporting their blunders and how, at various times, it has acted like a will-o'-the-wisp, as George Fox was in his well-known experience in Litchfield, we would doubtless have more evidence on the other side than we have. This doctrine has given us some remarkable ministers, but, as a rule, they have been lofty and narrow, and the tendency of their ministry has been to asceticism, rather than to broad humanitarian effort. (If this is not true, I shall esteem it a personal favor to be corrected.)

That oft-repeated and extravagantly emphasized saying of George Fox, that it was not necessary to be trained at Oxford or Cambridge, has been interpreted to mean that it was not necessary to be trained anywhere. Whatever he thought about the matter, it became the belief of his followers that God could put a whole sermon into the mouth of an ignorant man better than into the brain of a wise one. However much instantaneous illumination one may have, we now know that God uses what the person has. Often the sweet, deep experience of the unlearned is used to confound the mighty, but there is no discount upon intelligence.

It is useless to point out the failures of the past unless there is some way in which we can improve upon them. There is just one other point, however, in the old way to which I want to call our attention before suggesting some alterations in our methods, which seem to me to be wise. The early Friends testified against an "hireling ministry" and this protest of theirs, wise as it was, has been construed by their followers to be a testimony against anything paid to a minister by way of compensation for time and service. The ministry has languished under this regime. It is the direct outgrowth of the belief in the separation between mind and spirit, which led to the old ideas of prophecy, and the consequent distrust of human learning, which we have already seen to be an outdated antiquity. If a man did not need learning, if his sole source for instruction descended upon him without any effort of his own, he could just as well go about his business all the week without thought or care as to what he should speak. He must toil as others at his daily business and on meeting day open his mouth and the Lord would fill it. If he felt called to labor away from home, his expenses were to be met and his family provided for; but this degenerated into the merest farce; and, if the ministers did not provide for their own, they were poorly attended to. Many ministers were persons of sufficient means to bear their own expenses, and did so with pleasure, but I do not think that any of us will claim that the plan was a success. The quality of the ministry degenerated and many members were lost to the denomination, because they wanted to go where they were instructed. In the smaller meetings the same discourses were preached over and over until one knew when the minister arose just about what he would say.

But before going into this subject it might help clear the atmosphere to ask, What is the object of Quaker ministry? If we let the past answer, it was mainly to relieve the individual of a burden; apparently the hearers were not so much considered. "I feel a burden resting on my mind;" "I have been brought into deep exercise of mind;" "I shall not be clear if I do not express myself," etc., were the often-repeated expressions of our ministers. The main object, so far as it was expressed, was to free themselves. This is not saying that they were careless of the welfare of others or that there was not an abundance of good advice.

In our day the needs of the people are of first importance, and the object of the minister is to so bring to them the hopes, the consolations, and the victories which he himself has found in the Gospel that they, too, may live victorious lives; and it is important to know how this may be done most effectively.

It seems to me that the general condition leaves much to be desired, and I propose to mention the things I should like to see changed.

First in regard to the call. We all will agree that we cannot appoint ministers; the call must come from God, but it may come through human lips and the personal influence of godly men and women. This is a vital point which we as a church have neglected. We have been so afraid of touching the ark unbidden that we have allowed it to be carried captive by the Philistines. We should talk about the need of the ministry and the opportunity of service in the ministry. The old-time ministers made so much of their burdens and their crosses that it was enough to scare off the young and inexperienced. Add to this the almost inevitable life of poverty and hardship, which has been a self-evident witness, and is it to be wondered at that our ministers are growing fewer?

The matter of deliberately choosing to become a minister has not been put before our young people, because it was not regarded in the catalog of choices, but was a superimposed burden.

The ordeal of speaking in meeting has been called bearing the burden, taking up the cross, etc., until it has been an awful thing to do. In our day there are too many avenues for religious service which are not so handicapped—places where one may speak because his heart is in it and he loves to do it—for us to maintain this former rigor. Young people will, and do, go into the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. work, temperance, and various missionary efforts; and I believe it is because the way is made.

There is needed a degree of solemnity and a season of testing, and our way of allowing persons to speak in meeting as prompted by the spirit of truth is a wholesome method of starting young ministers, provided it is not so shrouded in awe and mystery as to drive them away. In fact, I do not see how otherwise we may ever learn whether the gift is there which will sanction our recording them. We should, however, make way for any who feel themselves called to have opportunity for service elsewhere than in our own meetings for worship. When I advocate our young people speaking in our meetings for worship,

I do not allude to the prevalent custom of testifying. To my mind this is detrimental to a real development in the ministry; too often it is a parrot-like repetition of former testimonies. We would not slacken one iota of the spiritual communion and the earnest seeking for light and guidance, but we maintain that one called to the ministry should use every opportunity to inform his mind and develop his reasoning faculties, and that the meeting should feel the responsibility of affording means for this, when such is wanting.

We would maintain, too, our belief in the power and efficacy of spontaneous preaching and should be grieved if the time came when all such is cut out of our meetings for worship; still we insist upon the necessity of a teaching ministry. Every congregation in our own yearly meeting needs instruction, line upon line and precept upon precept. To leave the young and untrained without special instruction is to follow one of the most discouraging features of the past. Some one, minister or elder, should be ready every First-day to speak to the needs and conditions of the congregations. This may be before or after the season of worship. For this purpose preparation is needed; and since it is the duty of the church to preach the Gospel, way should be made for the teacher to have opportunity for thought, research and meditation. In short, if he serve the meeting thus, it should minister to him in temporal affairs. Every member should willingly contribute to help carry this responsible duty, and the pastoral committee should see to it that his needs are supplied. It is not always desirable that the minister and pastor be the same person. But unless the eldership hastily get about their business of visiting and encouraging the membership some one person must be delegated to this important work. It is very unfortunate that the person selected for this duty often concludes and is allowed, nay almost forced, to run the meeting. Here is where the care and influence of the pastoral committee should make itself felt. We do not want Quaker priests; the very thing is incompatible with the priesthood of believers which we must at all hazards maintain.

The inner light so dear to Quaker hearts, the mystical union of spirit with the great overheart of God, is not an old and worn-out theory, but one throbbing with life and truth for us. The researches of that latest of the sciences, the science of the soul, confirms the position of both; but goes a step further and says with Paul, "God worketh in you both to will and to do of His own good pleasure"—in you, all of you; not heart or conscience or spirit, but in your minds and common-sense, in your heads and in your hands. It makes a new creature, and with the whole dedicated to God, we need not be so afraid of mental movements and organic effort. We need to exercise care and not allow our pendulum to swing as far over on the intellectual side as it did on the mystic, but to constantly keep the mind and will illumined by that light of Christ which shineth into the heart from the heart of God. "Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who, existing in the form of God, counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:5.).

There will be self-sacrifice on the part of the ministry under any possible arrangement, and we would not remove this if we could, but we need to bear the burden and not compel one man to bear all of the expense of the ministry, as we have been in the habit of doing. Some one has to make way for it. Shall the minister be the only one who does? Shall we allow him, poor man, to support a "hireling ministry?"

The ideal of our Quaker ministry will be attained when the minister, out of his great love for the people, proclaims the freedom he has found in Christ in such a careful manner that the people may understand, and the people, out of the great love for the welfare of the church, contribute their part gladly and as unto the Lord, each giving what God has given him for the spread of His Gospel.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE SNOW BABY.

BY J. L. SPICER.

They had been married for ten years, and no children came to add cheer and brightness to their tidy home. They both loved the Lord and little children; taught in Sunday-school and were active in missionary work. The wife was not very strong, and one day her husband, coming in unexpectedly, found her upon her knees sobbing pitifully. He gathered her up tenderly in his arms, and, kissing away the tears, asked her to tell him the cause of her trouble. A photograph of a lovely baby girl, the child of a loved schoolmate, was in her hand.

"Oh, George," she said, "I never thought I could love another's child as my own, but God has been showing me that among the many homeless little ones of earth, there must be one for us to bring to our home—one we can love and train for both worlds. Don't you think so dear?" And the soft cheek was pressed against his face. The answer was in the affirmative. The next day, bright and early, Mrs. Prince took the train for a near-by city.

She visited several institutions, but in none of them could she find the ideal baby girl—such a one as her friend had sent a picture of. Oh, no, the children of pain and poverty are poorly nourished; wan and thin, their great eyes, hungry for love and nurture, stand out strangely appealing, owing to their pale faces.

"Oh, God," she murmured, "where is the child of my hopes and prayers?"

There was but one more "home" to visit. As she came into the office, tired and faint, the superintendent in charge of placing out children, read in her eager eyes the story of her quest. "I want a lovely baby girl to adopt, big blue eyes, golden curls, rosy cheeks, both parents dead. Don't say you have none for me; I have tried so long and hard, I must not be disappointed here."

In a few moments she told the whole story of her longing, her husband's consenting, "If it were a real nice child," and how the Holy Spirit had shown her the selfishness of not opening her home to an unfortunate little one. The sympathetic superintendent had that morning been praying that the Christ, who, when on earth, took children in his arms and blessed them, would send some tender mother to take sick little "Willie" to her heart and home. His would be but a brief life if some such place for him was not soon opened. Mrs. Prince showed letters from her pastor and business men, these proving beyond a doubt her fitness for such a trust. The superintendent breathed a silent prayer and said: "I have the very child I believe God wants you to take and train for Him." "Oh! thank you, thank you!" the woman cried, impulsively. "Let me go to her at once, the little darling." "Wait just a moment, the child of your ideal, and the one God wants you to take may not be the same. Are you willing to let your true heart decide when you see it?"

"Yes—I believe so." But the brown eyes were full of tears. "Still, I don't think I could love anything unlovely, and my heart is set on a pretty child."

They went into the nursery and stopped by the crib, where Willie lay asleep. How thin he looked; his little hands seemed whiter than the counterpane. Tear stains were on his sunken cheeks.

"Poor, little fellow," sighed Mrs. Prince. The sound of her caressing voice seemed to reach the inner consciousness of the sleeper. He stirred, opened his big, blue eyes appealingly, then smiled a sad, sweet smile, for his little life had been one more filled with pain than pleasure.

Two little hands came up in mute appeal. Mrs. Prince took him up tenderly. Crowing a lullaby, he sank back to sleep, and the happy smile of content still lingered about the little mouth. "This is the child God wants you to take. Let your heart decide," said the superintendent, as he quietly left them. After a little time, Mrs. Prince came down, bringing "Willie." "He has won my heart, not because he is lovely, but he so much needs to be loved." The little bundle of clothing was made up. The matron dressed Willie in white. Eiderdown was about his face. Great feathery flakes of snow fell softly upon them as they went out to the trolley. "We will call him the snow baby," said the superintendent as he waved the good-byes from the window.

"Willie" developed most wonderfully in loving hands, being the "only one" in that happy home. Love, like some letters, must be marked "Personal" to insure the best results. Now, adopted, dimpled, rosy-cheeked and with clustering golden curls, the "snow baby" has been transformed into a winsome boy and happy, more than satisfied, Mrs. Prince says: "God knew better than I," and carefully, tenderly does her every duty.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

NEWS FROM NEW RECRUITS.

BY ROBERT L. SIMKIN.

After a fairly prosperous voyage across the Pacific, our steamer touched at Yokohama the day after Christmas, and we had the pleasure of spending a night in the hospitable home of Gilbert Bowles and his wife, of the Friends' Mission, in Tokio. We left with very favorable impressions of the Mission and of its superintendent, whose conversation betokens that he is thinking and working along those lines which the future progress of Japan must follow.

After ten days in Shanghai, we started up the Yangtse with Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Wigham and Miss Ella Warner, who had arrived from England, bound also for Chungking. As Mr. and Mrs. Wigham would have several days' wait in Ichang while the houseboats were being prepared, the rest of the party arranged to stop at Nanking to visit the Friends' Mission there. Accordingly, when our boats reached that city we were roused out of bed at 3 A. M. and were set off into a crowd of jabbering riksha men, who stood about us in the darkness, each trying to secure a passenger. However, Miss Butler, of the Friends' Mission, had sent a note by a trusty servant, who secured a carriage for us. As we rode along the narrow streets we could see dim lights shining through the cracks in the houses. Our own lanterns cast a half light upon the houses, revealing great red placards pasted up on the doorways. Directly in front of the door of many of the houses a wall has been built to prevent evil spirits from entering, as it is supposed that spirits cannot turn a corner, but must go straight in.

Some distance from the river we came to the city wall, and one of the men went ahead with his lantern to arouse the sleepy gate-keeper. Having got the door open, we entered a dark tunnel-like place, for the wall is 110 feet through here at the gate. Before we had driven through we heard the great door creaking on its hinges as it shut behind us. A ride of four miles further brought us to the mission compound, to which, after much knocking and several sleepy answers, we were admitted, and at last found ourselves beside a blazing fire.

As it was Sunday morning, we attended the Bible school and the preaching service, which followed, at which a young Chinese preacher spoke most earnestly from 1 John 4:12. About 100 men, women and children attended, and I shall not soon forget the eager look on some of their faces as they drank in the words. Though the meeting was altogether in Chinese, it was as orderly as ours at home, and the melody of "Blest be the tie that binds" and "Faith is the victory" seemed very familiar.

The Mission carries on a girls' boarding school besides evangelistic work, but their hospital is closed for lack of a physician, and the workers are longing for reinforcements. A young minister is greatly needed to give his attention to the building up of the native church.

The following morning, at 6:45, we had finished breakfast, and four chair-men were at hand to carry Mrs. Simkin to Luh Hoh, five miles to the Yangtse and thirteen miles from the other side. As we passed people were just carrying water and building fires. A cloud of smoke was pouring from the doorway of one house, there being no other chimney. Occasionally we passed a procession of donkeys, laden with bags of rice or with heavy pannier baskets. Passing through the fish market, where the street is so narrow that the men had to shout continually to make way for the chair, we came to the ferry.

At the other side I engaged a donkey, on which I could sit and touch the ground on both sides. As he refused to go, objecting, perhaps, to such a rider, I left him and walked the thirteen miles. I enjoyed walking, as I could follow along beside the chair and talk of the interesting things we saw. The road is little more than an elevated path through the fields. All along are many pools of water, in which people were fishing with dragnets.

At each village or group of mud huts, roofed with thatch, we would see several mongrel dogs, a few chickens and razor-backed pigs, and several water-buffalos, great lazy-looking fellows, which are used in tilling the fields and in grinding grain. The buffalo draws 'round and 'round a heavy stone roller, which crushes the grain beneath it.

Very frequently we would pass a shrine at the side of the road, little stone buildings a few feet square, with a little altar for burning incense. Many of the hillsides are thickly dotted with mounds, the burial places of the dead. Heavy wooden coffins are used, these being placed on or near the top of the ground and sods are banked up around them. The rains frequently wash down these sods, so that in this part of the country the edges of many coffins are visible or the coffins are half uncovered.

In the villages we were the objects of great curiosity, particularly at one place, where our chair-men stopped for tea and rice. When we opened our lunch basket the whole village crowded about to see the foreigners eat. At another village the people crowded 'round, felt the cloth of our garments, and one woman contrasted Mrs. Simkin's feet with her own bound feet, evidently wondering why a woman should have feet of the natural size. The people seemed very friendly and laughed when I tried the few words I had learned.

The Luh Hoh people were taken quite by surprise. At the compound, where Miss Holme and Miss Wood reside, a girls' school and a small boarding school for boys are carried on; in another part of the city are located Dr. DeVol's residence and the new hospital, recently opened. This is a substantial and well-planned building, one of which the many subscribers may well be proud. We visited, also, a street chapel, which is only one of the many outreaching fingers of this work. The opportunity of these four missionaries in a city of 30,000 is unlimited.

Almost the same can be said of any city which we have yet visited. No one can fully understand the awful need of this people until he comes and sees for himself. If it is opportunity that a young man wants, let him come to China.

While in Nanking, we saw much of the devastation of the famine. It was caused by too great a rainfall, which flooded the fields at the time of sowing. Many families which were before in moderate circumstances have deserted their homes and come to Nanking and other cities in the hope of obtaining aid. From 30,000 to 50,000 are encamped outside the walls of Nanking. Their miserable huts of straw or straw matting offer scarcely any protection from the cold, and still less from the rain. A whole family will cook, eat and sleep in a hut scarcely more than 7x12 and 5 feet high.

The missionaries and foreigners have formed a Relief Committee for the distribution of food and clothing, but they have been hampered in their work by the desire of the officials that all foreign-contributed funds be turned over to them for distribution. This the committee was unwilling to grant, for, though the officials may be entirely honest, they are unable to investigate each case personally, so as to be sure that the relief is applied where it is most needed. It has now been decided that the committee shall distribute clothing, while the officials try to meet the food problem.

We visited one of these stations, where rice was being given out, and, although it was late in the forenoon, there were still about 800 people in line waiting for their turn. Less than a quart of rice is given to each adult and half that quantity for each child. This must last for five days, after which the people are allowed to return for another supply. The outlook for these people is pretty serious, as the first considerable relief consists of a light crop, which is harvested in June, and in many places the seed itself has been consumed. Aid may be sent to Dr. Henry Hallack, 18 Peking Road, Shanghai, who is a member of the Relief Committee.

On the last afternoon of our stay at Nanking, we got some donkeys and started for the Ming Tombs, five miles distant. On the way we passed the ruins of the ancient palace. This was reached by five bridges, the centre one being used only by the Emperor. A building, with only one small door, is still pointed out in which tradition says the Emperor used to confine his wives when he was displeased with them, water being so arranged that it would drip on them constantly until death put an end to their misery.

Passing out through the gates of three or four walls and auxiliary walls, we suddenly came upon a scene such as one might expect in the Holy Land. Behind us was the city wall, 50 feet high, a silent monument to the industry of generations gone by. Below us the land dipped gradually to a long pool of standing water, and beyond this rose a low elevation stretching brown and barren far into the distance. Here and there over the hill ran rough paths, on one of which a donkey was picking his way briskly over the stones, the musical tinkle of his bell just reaching our ears. Close in the foreground was a new-made grave, and beside it, their faces bowed almost to the ground, two women were wailing out their grief in those sing-song tones peculiar to the East.

Far in the distance, at the left, is a giant mass of solid masonry, through which runs an inclined tunnel, giving entrance to a high hill at the rear. This hill is reported to have been made from earth brought from each of the 18 provinces of China and forms a fitting burial place for the bodies of its deceased Emperors. Winding up over the crest of the elevation which faces this hill, is a long avenue of stone images. First are Egyptian-like representations of men, the bodyguards of the Emperor, then animals—horses, elephants and camels. Of the animals there are four each, one pair standing and one pair kneeling—kneeling in the presence of the Emperor. May the day come soon—indeed, we believe it is now coming—when this great nation shall turn from its blind worship of the past and shall own our God as King of Kings and Lord of Lords, when of all its countless millions every one shall have at least heard the story of Jesus, at whose name every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess that He is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Just at nightfall, as we were returning, we witnessed the following sad sight: The Chinese believe that every person has three spirits, one of which leaves the body as soon as delirium or unconsciousness sets in. If proper measures are taken, this spirit may be persuaded to return. So here was a Chinese mother, whose child was at the point of death, trying to call back this spirit into the body. On the ground, in front of a temple, she had built five little fires of "cash paper" (to send money to the spirit), and about these she was rushing and calling out, frantically, "Lai ja la" (come back home), at which another woman, who stood by would answer, "Lai li-ao" (coming). Sometimes the cry, which was translated by the missionary who was with us, would change to other sounds, meaning, "It's getting late; come back home." "Come back and get your supper, there is a favoring wind now; I'll leave the gate open for you." Near by stood a young man, who was holding aloft a lantern to light the spirit back to the house.

With thousands of people all about us, whose religions have never taught them any better comfort than this, do you wonder that we thank God that we came to China?

We have been delayed in Ichang for several days by the slight illness of Miss Warner, but all is now ready, and we expect to start up the river to-day. We have two houseboats, besides a freight boat of the China Inland Mission, which is accompanying us.

SKETCH OF THEODORE L. CUYLER.

This is a fitting time to print a biographical sketch of Dr. Cuyler for information and preservation. If he lives to be a nonagenarian or a centenarian these beginnings will still be useful, and if the Master calls him to his reward sooner they will be at hand for ready reference.

Theodore Ledyard Cuyler was born in the village of Aurora, Cayuga County, N. Y., First month 10, 1822. The Cuylers are an old New York State family, dating back to the latter half of the seventeenth century. The first of the name in America was Hendrick Cuyler, who was a settler at Albany, N. Y., as early as 1677, and who, as his name indicates, was of Hollandish birth. A distinct Huguenot strain also appears in the early ancestral antecedents of the family. Both the grandfather and father of Dr. Cuyler were lawyers, prominent at the bar of Cayuga County. His father, B. Ledyard Cuyler, was educated at Hamilton College, where he was a classmate of Gerrit Smith, the famous Abolitionist advocate. He died at the early age of twenty-eight, when the son was but four years old.

Theodore L. Cuyler received his preparatory education in a school at Mendham, N. J., and in his seventeenth year entered Princeton College, where he was graduated in the class of 1841. After leaving college, he spent several months in Europe. During his sojourn abroad he had the advantage of personal introductions to Wordsworth, Thomas Carlyle, and other celebrated characters. He wrote from Europe a series of letters to American newspapers, which may be said to have been the beginning of his exceedingly prolific contributions to the press. Upon his return, he decided to fit himself for the ministerial calling—a determination to which he was influenced by his mother's wishes, although it had been the desire of other members of his family that he should follow the footsteps of his father and grandfather in the profession of the law. His own predilections for the ministry were strong from a youthful age, and he entered upon his theological studies with zest.

He was graduated from the Princeton Theological Seminary in May, 1846, was ordained by the presbytery, and soon afterward began to preach as "supply" at Kingston, Pa., a small place opposite Wilkes-Barre. From there he was called, in the autumn of the same year, to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Burlington, N. J., of which he remained in charge until 1849, when he became pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J., then just organized. After a successful ministry of four years at Trenton, he accepted a call from the Market Street Reformed Church, New York City. This proved to be the preliminary step toward his distinctive life work as a clergyman. He was then thirty-two years old, and in the full development of his powers, he at once rose to a position of marked usefulness in the metropolis.

His earnestness, his clear reasoning, his logical arguments, and his brilliant gifts of oratory attracted large audiences, and his work among young men was particularly successful. In the great revival work of 1858 he was one of the most conspicuous and effective laborers. Two years subsequently he severed his connection with the Market Street Church and entered upon his prominent career in Brooklyn (Fourth month, 1860).

There had recently been organized in the latter city a religious society connected with the Presbyterian denomination, which originally was known as the Park Church, but soon took the name of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church. Its membership was quite inconsiderable, but its expectations were hopeful, and the brilliant young New York clergyman was invited to become its pastoral head. Dr. Cuyler (who, however, had not at that time obtained his divinity degree) accepted the call on the condition that the congregation should purchase the plot of ground on the corner of Lafayette Avenue and Oxford Street, and should erect a church edifice with a seating capacity of 2,000. This condition being agreed to, he at once took charge, and as the result of his energies the cherished object was realized in a surprisingly brief period of time. The ground was purchased for $12,000, and in Third month, 1862, a splendid stone structure, costing $42,000, was completed and dedicated. The progress of the church to a condition of great prosperity and influence was rapid, and for very many years the Lafayette Avenue Church has occupied a foremost place among the churches of the Presbyterian denomination in America. Three other Brooklyn churches owe their organization to initiatives of Dr. Cuyler's congregation. In 1890 the membership of the church had reached nearly 2,400, while its Sunday-school had 1,600 members, being the third in rank in the General Assembly. In 1890, Dr. Cuyler, after having been its pastor for thirty years, withdrew from its active charge. He has since devoted himself to a general ministry, to whose labors he still cheerfully gives a share of his time.

It is noteworthy that throughout the fifty-six years of his active ministerial labors Dr. Cuyler never spent a Sabbath on a sick bed, and on only two occasions was incapacitated by illness from performing his pastoral duties. In that time he delivered to his own people nearly 3,000 sermons and more than 1,000 addresses. "His force in preaching," says an appreciative writer, "lies in picturesque description and the weaving in of scenes and illustrations from Scripture and from daily life. When he preaches doctrinal sermons he avoids technicalities. His texts are generally short, and his sermons open by some forcible form of illustration and close impressively by forcible appeal. Thus he enlists attention at the outset, and leaves an abiding effect at the conclusion. His style as a preacher is very earnest, and, judged by its results, singularly effective."

The International Lesson.

SECOND QUARTER.

LESSON II.

FOURTH MONTH, 14, 1907.

GOD GIVES JACOB A NEW NAME.

Genesis 32: 9-12, 22-30.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven. Luke 10: 20.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 8.—God gives Jacob a new name. Gen. 32: 9-12, 22-30.

Third-day, Fourth mo. 9.—Jacob's fear of Esau. Gen. 32: 1-8.

Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 10.—Preparing to meet Esau. 32: 13-21.

Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 11.—Esau reconciled. Gen. 33: 1-11.

Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 12.—Hezekiah's prayer. II Kings 19: 14-20, 32-35.

Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 13.—Importunate prayer. Luke 18: 1-8.

Time.—Possibly about 1780 years B. C. Jacob, apparently between fifty and sixty years old, though any definite period is mere guesswork.

Place.—Jabbok, now Wady Zerka, one of the chief rivers of eastern Palestine. It flows into the Jordan nearly opposite the city of Samaria. Peniel, or Penuel, "was probably a ridge near the Jabbok."

Persons.—Jacob and his family.

In order to refresh the memory and gain the connection, it would be well to read chapters 29, 30 and 31, and 32, 1-30. It was poetic justice that Jacob, who deceived his father, should himself have been deceived in having Leah forced upon him. The whole story told in these chapters is a typically Eastern one, and indicative of early times. Jacob had two wives and two concubines, and it is taken as a matter of course. It should always be placed to the great credit of Isaac that, so far as we know, he had but one wife and no concubines. The lesson opens with Jacob on his way back to Palestine with his family and large possessions. He is fearful of Esau and the retaliation which he might not unreasonably vent upon Jacob. He sends an humble message to Esau, and then, on hearing that Esau is approaching with 400 men, betakes himself to prayer, feeling that only the arm of Jehovah can sustain him.

9. "Which saidst." Gen. 31: 3. He was following the command of the Lord and felt that he might reasonably claim His protection.

10. "Mercies." "Lovingkindness," Amer. R. V. Jacob then compares his condition years before with the present. Then he went eastward with nothing but a staff, and now he returns with two companies (see verses 7, 8).

11. After thanksgiving Jacob comes to petition. Compare Phil. 4: 6. "The mother with the children." A Hebrew phrase, indicating a merciless slaughter. Compare Hos. 10: 14.

12. "And thou saidst," etc. Referring to a number of promises. See 28: 14, 15; 22: 17; 16: 10.

In the verses which are omitted, there is an account of how Jacob, in true Oriental fashion, determines to try to appease Esau by sending him rich presents.

22. The ford where Jacob is represented as crossing is still in use.

24. He wished to be alone and reflect upon the circumstances which surrounded him. "There wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day."

Jacob does not recognize who his antagonist is, but so strong is he that not until his thigh is touched and "strained" (R. V.) is he conquered. This was to show that he really was superior to Jacob.

25. Though lamed, Jacob still clings to his antagonist, perceiving that he is more than man, and so asks his blessing.

27. "What is thy name?" In Hebrew "name" is not unfrequently used as almost, if not quite, in the sense of "character," or "personality." "Jacob." The name means, "supplanter," the "crafty one," the "over-reacher."

28. "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob." The blessing takes the form of a change of name, and in this indicating Jacob's prevailing over difficulties and particularly over the danger threatened in Esau. "Israel." "God perseveres," or "Let God persevere." "For thou hast striven with God and with men, and hast prevailed." R. V. The struggle with God has just ended; that with Laban had come to an end previously, and the change of names is a good omen that the struggle with Esau will end favorably. Compare Hos. 12: 3, 4. "He could have been no common man who began his career as the 'supplanter' and ended it as 'a prince with God.'"

29. "Tell me, I pray thee, thy name." "A very unimportant desire at first sight. For what signifies a name? In these days when names are only epithets, it signifies nothing." But in those days it meant much. "He lived in the age when men are sincere, and truthful, and earnest, and names exhibit character. To tell Jacob the name of God was to reveal to him what God is and who." "To be blessed by God—to know Him and what He is—that is the battle of Jacob's soul from sunset till the dawn of day." "If Jacob had got a word, that word might have satisfied him. He would have said, 'Now I understand God, and know all about Him.'" He must learn more of God through experience, and also learn that he could never fully know Him. Compare Judg. 13: 17.

30. "Called the name of the place Peniel." That is, "Face of God." It was believed that no one could look on the face of God and live. Ex. 33: 20. This struggle is the turning point in Jacob's life. We hear no more of his practicing deceit. Jacob's struggle has been from the earliest times a type of prevailing prayer. Read Charles Wesley's noble hymn, "Come, O Thou Traveler Unknown."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE RISEN CHRIST.

That earthly life was o'er, the toil, the pain,
The agony of death, the bitter end.
Beholding it, Earth shuddered and did rend
The veil, and made the true Shekinah plain.
And now in hush of morn, where He has lain
The angels wait, and, as the anxious bend,
To see if hope their watchful care will lend,
Proclaim him risen. Off an endless skein,
The harshly severed thread is taken up—
Hereafter linked with Here, and Now with Then.
Unknownable is fused with Known, and Flesh
Dissolves into the Ultimate. The cup
He drank contained, as dregs, the sins of men,
With love unfeigned, He filled it up afresh.

TOPIC FOR FOURTH MONTH FOURTEENTH, 1907.

LESSONS FROM THE PATRIARCHS.

—III. JACOB.

First-day, Fourth mo. 14.—Refuge. Psalm 34: 15-22.
Gen. 48: 1-19.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 8.—The "supplanter." Gen. 25: 27-34.

Third-day, Fourth mo. 9.—The dreamer. Gen. 28: 10-22.

Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 10.—The lover. Gen. 29: 9-20.

Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 11.—The covenant maker. Gen. 31: 43-55.

Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 12.—The penitent. Gen. 32: 1-2.

Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 13.—The prevailer. Gen. 32: 24-32.

There is hardly a person named in the Bible of whom we have so intimate a knowledge as of Jacob. His career is foreshown by prophecy and indicated by an incident at his birth, and it is no hard task to picture to ourselves the years of keen-eyed watchfulness to win all that he could from the bluff and easy-going Esau, until, with an overfond and scheming mother to help and spur him on, he at last steals the prize of the birthright from its legal possessor.

We may be tempted to say that Jacob was very poor material from which to make a saint; but it is the chief glory of God's love that He takes hold of men just as they are—where they are and what they are—and if only they will give him a chance He will lead them up and out into the true realm of manhood, which is being a saint, blessed and a blessing. "Very human," we sometimes call Jacob and David and others, whom God called for special service and who sinned grievously; but let us not dwell too much on sin as an element of human nature. It is, after all, only a defective and a transient state unless we are going to class God as incapable or impractical, and the cost of it is adapted always to lead the prudent man from continuing therein.

Jacob had his retributions, and they were of unmitigated bitterness. How often do you suppose he went with shame over that scene of the deceiving of his father during the lonely nights of vigil in the fields with frost and rain as added tormentors? and how like the trick he and his mother had played on purblind old Isaac, was that which Laban played on him in giving him as wife the watery-eyed Leah, instead of the younger and beautiful Rachel. And whether penitence or fear was most active when he was about to meet Esau in the desert, there is no room for doubt that he was afraid. Guilty Consciences are poor armor, and that kidskin mask of earlier years doubtless seemed to Jacob just then a specially vulnerable target; and it was only when a buffeted and limping Jacob came with reliance—not in tricks and shrewdness, or even in persistence—but only in the word of "the angel," that he was ready to meet his brother, and to find that God had made a place for him in the land of promise.

But God was merciful to him, as He is to us all, and Jacob stands to-day as the pattern of a faithful lover, a zealous and profitable servant, and, finally, of a prince with God and men, whose faith cried out, "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me," and so prevailed.

Some Views on Present Day Topics.

Prof. Wm. Carlton Wood preached at Lynnvile, Iowa, on the 24th ult.

Amos Davis and wife visited in Whittier, Cal., for a few days, recently.

The Penn College Glee Club started on their vacation tour on the 21st ult. They sang in ten cities in Iowa, and in Omaha, Neb.

Professor Allen C. Thomas, of Haverford College, was at Friends' meeting, Washington, D. C., on the 24th ult. There was a good attendance present.

We have just heard of the sudden death of Amos Sanders, Los Angeles, on Fifth-day evening, the 22d ult. We hope to have more of the particulars later.

B. F. Farquhar and wife are doing a good work at Montebello, Cal. There are some families of Friends located there, and the prospect is encouraging for a meeting.

Thomas Armstrong is now laboring at Imperial, Cal., in the interest of the Church. It is hoped that a meeting may be established at that place. Alfred Wright has been preaching there for some time past.

Blue River Academy, Salem, Ind., recently closed a successful year's work under the instruction of Ralph S. Coppock and Charlotte B. Shields. Ralph S. Coppock will remain the third year as pastor and teacher of Blue River Meeting and School.

Zebedee Haines, of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, while on his way to North Carolina, visited several families of Friends in Virginia. While in Virginia, he attended meetings at Black Creek and Bethel, and preached the Gospel with much power at both places.

Dr. Wm. L. Pearson, formerly of Penn College, has been elected a Professor in the Biblical Department of Friends' University. The Oskaloosa Daily Herald, of the 21st ult., gives an account of his work at Penn College, and a few words about his prospective field of labor.

The Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia are fortunate in securing Dr. P. A. Baker, superintendent of the National Anti-Saloon League, to speak before the Annual Meeting of the Association, which will occur the evening of the 16th inst., at the meeting-house, 20 South Twelfth Street.

As a result of a revival conducted by Fred. Tormohlen, at Greentown, Ind., thirteen were converted and renewed. Friends were strengthened and encouraged. In all, seventeen sessions were held, and much interest was manifested from the beginning, which increased until the close, the 20th ult.

The Spring Term at Earlham College opened last week. A large number of district school-teachers are enrolling. The courses offered during the spring term are of such nature as to particularly appeal to the teachers. There was a small loss of students this term from various causes, but the total enrollment will remain practically the same as last term.

A letter from Columbus, Ohio, informs us that the article on "Prayer," by Professor Murray, was greatly enjoyed by some of the inmates of the Ohio State Prison. A Bible class, led by Chaplin Starr recently discussed the subject of "Prayer." Some of these men have been converted since their confinement, and take a deep interest in spiritual things.

Maurice M. Jones, of Earlham College, preached a very acceptable sermon at West Milton Meeting, First-day morning, the 24th ult, and again in the evening at Center Meeting.

Charles Weigle conducted a series of meetings, at Whittier, Cal., continuing two weeks, closing on the 10th ult. A few were converted and many others blest by attending the meetings.

Friends at Cowan, Ind., held a series of evangelistic meetings, beginning Second month 17th, and closing Third month 4th. The pastor, Oliver P. Gotschall, Lewisville, was assisted by Oliver C. Beeson and daughter Clara, George Linville and Edward Tinney. About fifty made a definite stand for Christ; fourteen united with Friends, and more are expecting to join soon. Oliver P. Gotschall is well liked by the Friends of Cowan and holds a large place in the hearts of the townspeople.

The permanent board of Oregon Yearly Meeting of Friends has decided to change the date for holding the next yearly meeting, making it one week later. The change is made on account of the date of Seventh month 9th, the time fixed for the opening, being in conflict with the date of holding of the International Christian Endeavor convention which will be held at Seattle. The date set for the opening is Seventh month 16th, when the first business session will be held at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

While on a business trip for Penn College, President Rosenberger recently spent two weeks in southern California. He found time to visit his many friends in Whittier, and drove out in the country three or four miles to his nice walnut orchard. The college and high school students very much appreciated his talks given at "Chapel." He left for home, in Iowa, the 15th ult. While here, President Tebbetts and wife gave a reception in his honor, to a large number of Penn College people, which was an occasion greatly enjoyed by all present.

Mary Moore, one of the few Friends in New York Yearly Meeting, who still retains the Quaker garb, has most successfully organized a "Quaker Round Table," at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. At a recent meeting, she gave an interesting presentation of "The Value of a Thorough Knowledge of Friends' Doctrines, Principles and Practices." Willard O. Trueblood carefully prepared an account of "The Social and Political Conditions in England in the Seventeenth Century," using the blackboard effectively. Prof. Lincoln Roys gave "Historic Bulwarks of Quakerism in England." There was a large attendance and new interest in these important themes was awakened.

A successful revival meeting was concluded, Third month 21st, at New Lexington, Ohio. Levi Mills, of Wilmington, Ohio, has been preaching to this congregation every other Sabbath since last yearly meeting, and his ministry has been very helpful. On Second month 24th, C. W. Moorman, pastor of the Jamestown Meeting, commenced evangelistic services in the meeting. Levi Mills preached at the morning service, at the opening of the meetings, but on account of sickness was not able to be present again until after the close of the meetings. The meetings lasted for twenty-four days, forty services in all. There were forty-eight conversions and renewals. Twenty-one united with Friends. Nearly all the Friends comprising this congregation were visited in their homes, and the sick of the village were visited without regard to their church membership. This congregation hope to have constant pastoral care in the near future.

J. Lindley Spicer, who is the General Superintendent of Evangelistic and Church Extension, Field Secretary of the Bible School Board and Representative of the Y. P. S. C. E. of New York Yearly Meeting, attended the Friends' meeting at Tillson, Sabbath evening, the 17th ult. He gave a helpful address on Bible Study, using objects to enforce the teaching. Second-day evening was devoted to Temperance and Purity. Third-day, he gave a most interesting account of some of his experiences during his recent voyage and visit to Scotland and England. Fourth-day, his subject was Peace and Arbitration. The great good that would accrue if the enormous expenditures of war and preparations for war were turned into channels for the uplifting of humanity through education, and the betterment of conditions was a prominent feature. Fifth-day, he spoke on Friends' Missions. Sixth-day, to the children, and in the evening, on "Finished Products of Christian Endeavor," illustrated by objects.

Sugar Plain Meeting, near Thornton, Ind., has been favored with a gracious spiritual awakening, where Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame have just closed a series of meetings which lasted four weeks. Their ministry is not only thoroughly Scriptural, but their long, varied and successful work as soul-winners affords them a rich fund of experience from which they draw illuminating and effective illustrations. Not for years has this meeting had such a mighty uplift; backsliders were reclaimed; many were converted. The membership, as well as numbers from other churches, were led into greater liberty in the Lord. Over twenty will unite with Friends as a result of the work.

The following clipping is taken from an Ohio paper, and gives an account of a meeting in which our friends, Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame took a leading part.

The union revival services at the M. E. Church were largely attended both Sunday morning and evening. Mrs. Frame, the Quaker evangelist from Richmond, Ind., by her masterly sermons has won the appreciation of the people. Her address is polished to the highest point of refinement, and all without any loss of power. Her sermons are with "power and in the demonstration of the Spirit." She is attended by her husband, who is also an efficient worker. These evangelists have been used of God in great revivals everywhere they have gone. From 25,000 to 30,000 have been converted in their meetings. A great revival is expected in Forest by all those who are in sympathy with the meetings now in progress.

The new meeting-house just being completed by the South Wabash (Ind.) Friends will be dedicated the 21st inst. Allen Jay, Richmond, Ind., is to preach the dedicatory sermon. Daisy Barr, Fairmount, Ind., will speak in the evening service. Tennyson Lewis, Van Wert, Ohio, the minister under whose pastorate the work of preparation for the erection of the house was begun, and other ministers from various parts of the yearly meeting will be present. The dedication will be followed immediately by a series of evangelistic meetings conducted by George W. Willis, Cleveland, Ohio. The new meeting house is very conveniently arranged, and modern throughout, built of white brick and stone, and is a beautiful structure. There are four good-sized rooms that can be thrown together on the main floor, besides the pastor's study. The interior is beautifully frescoed, furnished with oak pews in the main auditorium and with assembly chairs in the lecture room. The building is arranged for full basement, but only two rooms are being finished below at present. The cost of the building will be between $10,000 and $11,000.

A letter from Friendswood, Tex., reads as follows:—

Perhaps I can answer some of the many questions through THE AMERICAN FRIEND that are asked so often by northern people. We have an established meeting of more than 100 members. The monthly business meeting is held in the evening of the third Seventh-day of each month. We have a good Bible school with a little more than 100 enrolled. I think the average attendance is sixty-five or seventy. The spiritual life of the meeting is quite good. I think above the average. We have a good Christian Endeavor and Junior League, and a prayer meeting on Fifth-day night. There have been a great many visitors here from Indiana and other States in the past year. A company of men are building a large preserving factory here that will cost $25,000 or $30,000, which will be a great thing for this country. There will probably be an immense fig crop to handle soon. There is a great crop of strawberries on hand now for which I think they are getting $4 per crate. Some of the farmers have already been selling new potatoes and other vegetables. Strawberries have been ripening ever since the middle of Twelfth month. The people here struggled hard for a few years to get started, nearly all coming here poor, but now prosperity is marked on every hand. Our new chapel, which we worked so long and hard for, is at last completed. The first commencement exercises were held in it three weeks ago. There were three graduates. Professor A. L. Knight and Margarette Garretson were the teachers in the academy this year. We certainly appreciate our nice meeting room, and find already that our meetings are larger and more punctually attended than when we held them upstairs. This is a very desirable place to live, and make a living on a few acres of ground. Nearly all the people who live here came in a semi-invalid condition or worse, and have so far recovered that a doctor has not been called to the neighborhood for six months or more. Roses have been blooming all winter in the yards. The people are getting ready to plant their rice. There will be a great crop of oranges and a few bananas.

The sixtieth wedding anniversary of Chas. F. and Rhoda M. Coffin occurred on the evening of the 25th ult., at their home, 3232 Groveland Avenue, Chicago. A large company of Friends gathered to extend their hearty congratulations, some coming from New York, Richmond, Ind., and Minneapolis, Minnesota. Letters and telegrams poured in from all parts of the world, and a wealth of flowers expressed the affection of many years.

Their five sons, with their wives, several grandchildren and great grandchildren, gathered on the preceding day and enjoyed a family re-union.

Chas. F. Coffin and his wife have been acknowledged ministers in the Society of Friends for over forty years, and at present are ministers of Chicago Meeting.

In 1860, a movement was originated by him and his wife, assisted by other young Friends, to permit greater liberty of action in meetings for worship than had been allowed before.

For six years a prayer meeting was held weekly in C. F. Coffin's house which resulted in establishing Richmond, Ind., Monthly Meeting of Friends, which was the pioneer in the active work that has so fully identified the Church with other Protestant bodies, and made it the active missionary force it is to-day.

Many years of his life were devoted to Prison Reform work. He originated Indiana Reform School for Boys, and for years was president of the Board of Directors. He was for over twenty-six years Clerk of Indiana Yearly Meeting, and was on the Executive Committee of Friends in America, in charge of Indian Affairs. During the Civil War, he was an energetic worker in the cause of the Freedman's Aid Society. He was one of the most active men in founding and organizing Indiana Boarding School, now Earlham College. His wife, Rhoda M. Coffin, has been almost as active along other lines. She established and maintained, for over ten years, a mission school for the care of children, which at one time reached an attendance of 1,700. She was largely instrumental, in company with the late Mrs. Hendricks, in establishing the Girls' Reform School and Women's Prison in Indiana, which was the first one of its kind managed and officered wholly by women.

She was prominently identified with the attempt to reorganize the management of the insane hospitals within the State of Indiana, and, with her husband, made a trip to Europe in the early seventies to make a study of eleemosynary institutions. Of late years, she has been engaged quietly in religious work as opportunity offered.

Charles F. Coffin is now eighty-four, and his wife eighty-one, and both enjoy fairly good health; they rarely miss meeting on a Sabbath. Probably there are few living who have devoted as much time, energy and money to carry forward the great reforms and religious interests of the Friends as Charles F. and Rhoda M. Coffin.

MARRIED.

MENNELL.—FERRIS.—At the Elms, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Second month 12, 1907, Mabel Livingston Ferris, daughter of the late Robert M. and Mary Anna Taber Ferris, to Edward Newman Mennell, of London, England.

DIED.

DUNLAP.—At Friendsville, Tenn., Third month 15, 1907, Nancy T. Dunlap, in her eighty-eighth year. She was a member of Friendsville Monthly Meeting. Her life was characterized by much patience—sometimes under sore trial.

GUTTERY.—At Sterling, Kan., Second month 27, 1907, Anna Guttery (formerly Hunt) in her seventy-fourth year. The deceased was a much-beloved member and Elder of Sterling Monthly Meeting, Kansas, faithful in life, triumphant in death.

The widow of Russell Sage has added $100,000 to her former gift of $250,000 for the proposed eight-story building for the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. She will defray the entire expense of erecting the building and equipping it. The new building will be in New York City. The property was given to the Young Men's Christian Association by the wife of William E. Dodge. It cost $135,000. The building will also provide ample space for the offices of the national board of the Young Women's Christian Association.

The Second Tri-Union General Council of the United Brethren, Methodist-Protestant and Congregational Churches met at Dayton, Ohio, Third month 19th. The plan for union was decidedly advanced. Articles of agreement were drawn up, which will be submitted to the several churches for their ratification. In commenting upon the Council, the Congregationalist says: "The progress thus far of this great movement, increased by so nearly unanimous approval by all the delegates to this definite plan of union, must give a new impetus and create stronger expectation of its accomplishment."

Twenty-four members of the Laymen's Commission will be present at the Conference of the World's Student Christian Federation, to be held in Tokyo, Fourth month 3d to 7th. They will also attend the great convention to be held in APPENDICITIS.

NOT AT ALL NECESSARY TO OPERATE IN MANY CASES.

Automobiles and Appendicitis scare some people before they are hit.

Appendicitis is often caused by too much starch in the bowels. Starch is hard to digest and clogs up the digestive machinery—also tends to form cakes in the cecum. (That's the blind pouch at entrance to the appendix.)

A N. H. girl had appendicitis, but lived on milk for awhile—then Grape-Nuts and got well without an operation.

She says: "Five years ago while at school, I suffered terribly with constipation and indigestion." (Too much starch, white bread, potatoes, etc., which she did not digest.)

"Soon after I left school I had an attack of appendicitis and for thirteen weeks lived on milk and water. When I recovered enough to eat solid food there was nothing that would agree with me, until a friend recommended Grape-Nuts.

"When I began to eat Grape-Nuts I weighed 98 pounds, but I soon grew to 115 pounds. The distress after eating left me entirely and now I am like a new person."

(A little Grape-Nuts dissolved in hot water or milk would have been much better for this case than milk alone, for the starchy part of the wheat and barley is changed into a form of digestible sugar in making Grape-Nuts.) Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Shanghai Fourth month 25th to Fifth month 6th. At both of these meetings there will also be present a British Commission, representing what is called the "China Missions Emergency Committee." Correspondence is in progress with reference to a date on which a strong deputation representing the Laymen's Missionary Movement, will go to London to confer concerning a joint movement for world-wide missions on the part of the men of the two great missionary nations of the world. The date is likely to be fixed in Fifth month, though it is possible it may not be until Sixth month.

FORGETTING THE MAIN THING.

To-day the distinction between righteous and sinners is the main thing, for upon a lively consciousness of that distinction rests the hope of transmitting our institutions undecayed, of preserving our democratic ideals, of avoiding stratification and class rancor. Yet most people act as if something else were the main thing. Just as in the South the senseless agitation of the race question is delivering that section into the hands of the railroad corporations; just as in the far West Mormonism is a red herring to drag across the trail of some iniquity when the public is hot on the scent; just as "Catholicism in the schools" raises a dust behind which franchise grabbers can operate; so the divisions and cross-purposes of decent people give the sinner his chance to get away. The puppets of the interests from the town council to Congress stand together as "statesmen." On the other hand, the public they plunder, like Martha "troubled about many things," divides on race, creed, or style, pelts the nonconformist more than the sinner, and lays on a little finger where it ought to wield a fist. Thus the wolves hunt in packs, while the watchdogs snap at one another!—E. A. Ross, in the April Atlantic.

DESIRE

All else for use, one only for desire;
Thanksgiving for the good, but thirst for Thee:
Up from the best, whereof no man need tire,
Impel Thou me.

Delight is menace, if Thou brood not by,
Power is a quicksand, Fame a gathering jeer.
Oft as the morn (though none of earth deny These three are dear)

Wash me of them, that I may be renewed,
Nor wall in clay mine agonies and joys:
O close my hand upon Beatitude!
Not on her toys.

ROMANTIC DEVONSHIRE.

THE LAND MADE FAMOUS BY PHILPOTTS' NOVELS.

Philpotts has made us familiar with romantic Devonshire, in his fascinating novels, "The River," "Children of the Mist," etc. The characters are very human; the people there drink coffee with the same results as elsewhere. A writer at Rock House, Orchard Hill,
Bideford, North Devon, states:

"For thirty years I drank coffee for breakfast and dinner, but some five years ago I found that it was producing indigestion and heart-burn, and was making me restless at night. These symptoms were followed by brain-fag and a sluggish mental condition.

"When I realized this, I made up my mind to quit drinking coffee and having read of Postum, I concluded to try it. I had it carefully made, according to directions, and found to my agreeable surprise at the end of a week, that I no longer suffered from either indigestion, heart-burn or brain-fag, and that I could drink it at night and secure restful and refreshing sleep.

"Since that time we have entirely discontinued the use of the old kind of coffee, growing fonder and fonder of Postum as time goes on. My digestive organs certainly do their work much better now than before, a result due to Postum Food Coffee, I am satisfied.

"As a table beverage we find (for all the members of my family use it) that when properly made it is most refreshing and agreeable, of delicious flavor and aroma. Vigilance is, however, necessary to secure this, for unless the servants are watched they are likely to neglect the thorough boiling which it must have in order to extract the goodness from the cereal." Name given by

HOW SHALL WE THINK OF CHRIST AS SAVIOUR?

As we have said, it has become wellnigh impossible to think of Christ as "mere man." We think of Him as God-with-us—both Divine and human—the personal focus point where the illimitable God reveals Himself in a human face. Now there comes before us the further question, How does Christ's death minister to our salvation?

It is frequently said that there is a tendency to-day among men of thought and scholarship to reduce Christ's work to the level of moral influence, to think of Him as a Teacher rather than as a Saviour, and to make Him a model, or an example, rather than a Redeemer from sin. I do not find such a tendency among the men I know. I find rather a deep and simple faith in the Gospel of salvation through the Cross of Christ.

Our deepest desire is to think and speak of Christ's work only in terms that are real and vital. We are anxious not to use words that are dead and empty for us, and we are unwilling to adopt phrases that are not alive with personal experience. If we have hesitated sometimes to adopt time-honored words and phrases, it has been because they expressed too little, not because they expressed too much to suit us. The reality of the unspeakable gift of God in Christ is too great for any words or phrases which have been, or will be, coined by human speech. But we shall endeavor to say what we mean.

Sin is a positive fact, and so long as it exists, it sunders the soul from God and spoils the life. It is a condition in which we set our will against God's will, and are at enmity with Him. We do not own His sway, we do not love His will, we do not choose His purpose—we are not at one, we are divided. It will not help us to forgive us, and still leave us where we were. It will not save us to remove the punishment, or the penalty, and still leave the heart's attitude as it was before. We need reconciliation, we want atonement, the enmity must be annulled. "While we were enemies," says Paul, "we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son." What does that mean? How does the death of Christ reconcile us?

It shows us, first of all, that there is no enmity toward us on God's part. He is not angry with us. He does not hate us. Far otherwise. He takes upon Himself our nature. He enters into our condition. He bears the tragedy of sin and treads the wine-press of suffering which sin involves. He, the very God, identifies Himself with us, shares our bitterest cup, goes straight on on the road which leads up to the cross, because there is no limit to His sympathy and love. He gives Himself for us.

It is a vicarious death. He suffers and dies, not because He deserved to, but because sin had made such a world that a Person like Christ could not take up the task of saving it without dying. It is the tragedy of sin that it involves the innocent and makes them suffer, too, and the holier the Person the deeper the suffering.

There is no way of carrying spiritual life into the world of sin, except the way of suffering, and Christ is the infinite vicarious sufferer. The Cross is not a revelation of wrath, but a revelation of the tragedy of sin and the cost of redemption. Christ seals His love with His own blood.

Here breaks forth the mighty fact of Divine Grace, that "while we were yet in sin Christ died for us"—"He loved us and gave Himself for us." Instead of enmity, there is sacrifice, instead of wrath there is suffering love, instead of demand for revenge there is complete self-giving. He takes our nature upon Himself, and gives Himself, the holy, for us, the unholy.

What shall we say to these things? Shall we not say, God is for us? Nothing can separate us from His love in Christ Jesus. All things are for us, since Christ is God's. And shall we not become reconciled by such unsearchable love? But we may not stop at the statement of the doctrine of Grace. Salvation is a positive change in our entire attitude. It is a vital transformation. If we really see the meaning of the Cross, it must make an actual difference in our heart and will. If He did that for me I cannot live my old life any longer. I, too, must be crucified to self and live unto Him. His will must become my will, and His purpose my purpose—I must henceforth love what He loves, and I must hate what He hates. Salvation involves a double substitution—He takes our nature upon Himself to save us, and, if we would be saved, we must take His will for our will. And so the reconciliation is complete.

WOOD INSTEAD OF MARBLE.

The Commonwealth founded by the Quakers, and bearing the name of a worthy Friend, recently erected a $13,000,000 capitol building, already known the world over for the excessive price paid for its construction. Investigations now in progress reveal some of the most flagrant "graft" ever discovered in the world. The supposed crimes of Phidias, enacted in the golden days of Greece, upward of two thousand years ago, have more than their counterparts in Christian America to-day. The Greeks rose in indignation when they supposed their gifted sculptor had betrayed his trust, and appropriated for himself the gold and ivory which were given for the statue of Athena. No less were they outraged when they supposed he had engraved on the shield of the goddess a likeness of himself and Pericles. He succeeded in proving that the charges were untrue; but the Pennsylvanians acknowledge their crimes, and sneeringly ask what we are going to do about it. Not only were competing contractors debarred from bidding on the new capitol, and excessive prices allowed for nearly every item, but inferior goods were substituted throughout the entire structure. Seldom, if ever, in pagan annals can we find anything to parallel this statement from a recent daily: "Another case of substitution, by which the contractor's profits were increased by $100,000, according to experts, was disclosed to-day. Wood was used instead of marble for pillars in the House of Representatives." Yet this is a fragment of our own history. There are many other examples of a similar kind, but one instance will suffice to illustrate the moral weakness, which is too prevalent in our political and commercial life.

The occasion of this moral break-down is a common acceptance of a double standard. Men who are perfectly honest with their neighbors, sanction questionable methods in "the firm." Many of the well-to-do, who are kind and considerate to personal acquaintances, are at the same time maintaining "sweat shops," in order to cope with their competitors, or paying wages so low that crime is almost the only relief. Men who appropriate corporate and municipal funds for private use would carefully guard, as a sacred trust, the belongings of a friend, and give as an excuse for such conduct the prevalence of the practice. On the other hand, many from the poorer classes are guilty of like offences. "Thou shalt not steal, except from corporations and rich men," is a popular rendering of the Eighth Commandment. Men who would walk a mile to pay for a postage stamp, think nothing of beating their way on a railroad, or dodging a street-car conductor. The moral code applied to individuals is set aside when dealing with corporations. To them business is business, and must be conducted in a "business way." In other words, a great number from all classes divide life into compartments, applying different standards of morals in each compartment, and wood is used instead of marble, and tolerated by seemingly good people.

It was just this kind of living that stirred Fox and the early Friends so deeply, and against which they made a vigorous protest. The most striking example of this was their opposition to war. If it be wrong for one man to kill another, they argued, it is wrong for a group of men to kill another group. What is immoral for one man taken separately is immoral for all men in the aggregate. Moral law for them was universal—it had no limits. With this conception, their religion was a principle of life, which affected not only a part, but the whole of it. Men must be holy not alone in their church affairs, or at stated times and seasons, but in their conversation and daily walk; not only in their conduct, but in their innermost thoughts and aspirations.

The need for this message is growing daily, since the changes which are taking place in our industrial and commercial world are lessening the number of transactions between man and man. We deal almost entirely with representatives of corporations, or act as their agents, thus removing the wholesome influence of personal friendship and acquaintance. Nor is this all, for much of the business of a questionable character is carried on by superintendents and clerks, who are perfectly aware of the crookedness to which they are parties, but who are induced to act against their convictions for fear they could not find employment without it. The need is great, and the call is loud. The service to be rendered is not easy. It is cowardice to try to avoid it. To withdraw would be as criminal as active participation. Protest means ridicule and possible or actual financial loss, yet the demand is upon us, calling for heroic endeavor.

Forgive and forget! Why, the world would be lonely,
The garden a wilderness left to deform,
If the flowers but remembered the killing breeze only,
And the fields gave no verdure for fear of the storm.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING.

BY ELLISON R. PURDY.

The membership of Iowa Yearly Meeting numbered, at last census, 11,506. Its meetings are found in the States of Iowa, Nebraska, Colorado, South Dakota, North Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Missouri. One quarterly meeting, Winneshiek, is composed of meetings in three States, and the quarterly meeting is held in the summer and fall in Iowa, in the winter in Wisconsin, and in the spring in Minnesota; but the bulk of the membership is not so much scattered as would appear by this description. About 8,000 Friends, three-fourths of the membership, are located within a territory comprising less than one-third of the State of Iowa.

Meetings are found in Minneapolis, Denver, and Des Moines, and in about a dozen smaller cities, but 90 per cent. of the meetings are in small villages or country districts. About one-fifth of the meetings are in sections that Friends have entered in the past few years. Several meetings are on the frontier. There are at present 122 meetings, not counting several outposts, and 178 ministers were reported last year. With one or two exceptions, all of the meetings are supplied with pastors, whose time is entirely given to the work. There are 86 pastors, a few of whom are not recorded ministers. Some of these serve more than one meeting. About 20 per cent. of the pastors are women, and about 10 per cent. are without families. A large number of the meetings own homes for the pastor, and in a few cases there is a small piece of land for his use. In one city meeting the pastoral support amounts to $1,200 per year. In three other meetings the support amounts to from $800 to $1,000. In 10 meetings, $600 to $800, including value of house rent. In 13 others, $400 to $600. The other meetings raise from $100 to $400, in addition to much that is brought in in the way of gifts.

The pastors of Iowa Yearly Meeting form a very solid and loyal part of its active membership. They are humble, earnest, hard-working men and women, with very little of the signs of professionalism about them.

Congregational singing is the practise in all of the meetings, and the responsibility of preaching rests largely with the pastor, but is not confined entirely to him, and many take part freely in prayer and testimony.

The vocal exercises in the typical meeting consist of several hymns, a number of prayers, a Scripture reading, a sermon, and several testimonies or exhortations. Sometimes the sermon is omitted; sometimes there is more than one. The tendency of late does not seem toward a more formal program. It is not the custom, as in other denominations, to omit the meeting if the minister is not present, but effort is usually made to secure the presence of some minister or leader. It is the opinion of the writer that the most active meetings are not lacking in appreciation of the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

In a few of the meetings the usual congregation will number 200 or 300, but a majority of the congregations number less than 100. In the stronger meetings the morning gathering is much the larger; but some meetings, which have a small morning congregation, have a large attendance in the evening, made up mostly of those who are not members, and with a large proportion of young people.

Many meetings are growing in size, but others are becoming gradually weaker, having been diminished by large migrations to the West. This has become especially true in Iowa since land has attained so high a value. One meeting gave 20 removal certificates to a meeting in California in one year. One meeting is represented in a western meeting by a number of its former members, almost equal to its present membership. On the whole, the membership has gradually increased. From three to six new meeting-houses are built each year, and five or more ministers recorded, and the support of pastors, and the quality of meeting houses have decidedly improved in the past few years.

A great deal is done in revival work. Eight or ten evangelists are employed most of the time, and a number of pastors leave home for one or two series of meetings during the year. From yearly meeting time to First month 1st, about four months, 34 series of meetings were held. These were conducted by 13 evangelists and nine pastors. The method usually followed in these meetings is to invite seekers forward for prayer, and workers remain to instruct and pray with them. Much is also accomplished by personal conversation at the close of meetings, and in house-to-house visiting. It is possible that on some occasions there has been an undue amount of excitement, but the leaders are generally guarded in this matter, and there is a strong sentiment against fanaticism. The quiet method in dealing with inquirers is becoming more in vogue.

In a few meetings the study of historic Quakerism has claimed some attention, and there is an increasing inquiry, especially in new meetings, as to the doctrines of Friends. It is thought by some that there is a lessening dependence upon the pastor, and a growing appreciation of personal worship. The pastors themselves labor to strengthen this sentiment.

The educational interests of Iowa Yearly Meeting are represented by Penn College, at Oskaloosa, Ia., Nebraska Central College, at Central City, Neb., and two academies, one at Salem, Iowa, and the other at Pleasant Plain, Iowa. There is a large and flourishing academy at New Providence, Iowa, conducted by Friends, and largely attended by Friends, but entirely under private management. Four academies have been discontinued, because they were unable to compete with public schools. Among the students at Penn College there are, at present, six recorded ministers, as many more who often preach, and others who manifest a gift in the ministry.

The competition made by State institutions, with their immense incomes, and the large number of denominational colleges in the State, render it imperative that a most generous support be given to this college, and the wide spread and increasing interest in education offers a great opportunity.

Nebraska Central College is doing a good work, mostly in the academic grades. A proposition will be made to the five years' meeting to establish a new yearly meeting to be composed of five quarterly meetings, viz.: Hiawatha, in southwestern Nebraska; Platte Valley, in central Nebraska; Union, in northern Nebraska; Spring Bank, in northeastern Nebraska, and Mt. Vernon, in South Dakota. The Friends of these quarterly meetings have been, for some time, organized into an association for the purpose of carrying on religious and educational work. Nebraska Central College is maintained by this association, and will doubtless become the center of the educational interest of the new yearly meeting.

The Bible School enrollment of Iowa Yearly Meeting numbers about half as many as the membership, and includes many who are not members. There is an increasing interest in Bible study among Friends.

The peace sentiment seems to be deepening among us, and much work is done along temperance lines.

Jamaica is the missionary field of Iowa Yearly Meeting, but other fields claim their sympathy, especially Cuba and Africa. About $1.20 per member was contributed through the regular channels last year, and doubtless there was much not reported.

The number of Christian Endeavorers reported last year was 1,223, 15 societies not reporting; Intermediates, 19; Juniors, 370. They contributed $858.95 to the missionary funds last year.

Following is a description of the different quarterly meetings:

ACKWORTH.

Located in south central Iowa. Number of meetings, 7; pastors, 6. This quarter has almost doubled its membership in three years. Has four new meeting-houses, and will build another this spring. Membership, 795; gain last year, 46.

BANGOR.

Situated in central Iowa. Number of meetings, 11; pastors, 9. This quarter is growing. Present membership, 1,113; gain last year, 43.

DENVER.

Comprises all Colorado meetings. Meetings, 5; pastors, 5. Denver Meeting has just remodeled its meeting-house. The new meeting at Colorado Springs had a very successful revival recently. They have bought a house and lot for pastor, and will build a meeting-house in the spring. This quarterly meeting is growing fast. Present membership, 458; gain, 83, last year.

DES MOINES.

Situated in central Iowa. Meetings, 4; pastors 3. Des Moines is the only strong meeting in this quarter. Present membership, 700; slight gain last year.

GREENVILLE.

Northwestern Iowa. Meetings, 3; pastors, 3. Membership, 272, divided about equally among the three meetings. Loss last year, but gaining this year.

HIAWATHA.

Located in southwest Nebraska. Meetings, 4; pastors, 1. Present membership, 112. A hopeful field now, as people are beginning to move into that section.

HONEY CREEK.

Meetings, 7; pastors, 4. Located in north central Iowa. Has been losing ground lately. Two meeting-houses closed and two others temporarily closed. New Providence is a strong meeting. Honey Creek, Chester and Hubbard are aggressive meetings. Present membership, 869; gain last year, 6.

LYNN GROVE.

Located in south central Iowa. Meetings, 6; pastors, 6. Loss last year, 10. Meetings all small, except Lynnvillle. Present membership, 670.

MINNEAPOLIS.

Located in Minneapolis, Minn. One meeting; no pastor. Some prospect of aggressive work in the future. Present membership, 204.

MOUNT VERNON.

Located in southern South Dakota. Meetings, 5; pastors, 4. Meetings all small. Two meetings are located 80 miles west of Chamberlain, and composed of people who live on homesteads. Present membership, 188, an average of about 20 to the meeting. They have three meeting-houses, and homes for two of the pastors.

OSKALOOSA.

Southeast central Iowa. Meetings, 12; pastors, 10. Oskaloosa meeting in this quarter is the largest meeting in the yearly meeting. The yearly meeting is held there. There are several new meetings in mining towns in the southern part of the quarter. Present membership, 1,356; gain last year, 66. Penn College is located at Oskaloosa.

PLATTE VALLEY.

Located in central Nebraska. Meetings, 8; pastors, 3. Nebraska Central College is located at Central City. The meeting here is strong. Other meetings small. Present membership, 633; slight gain over last year.

PLEASANT PLAIN.

Located in southeastern Iowa. Meetings, 8; pastors, 4. Three small meetings; all meetings aggressive. Present membership, 1,101; gain of 67 over last year.

SALEM.

Located in southeastern Iowa and Missouri. Meetings, 6; pastors, 4. Salem is the oldest meeting in the yearly meeting. All meetings are small. Catholics are encroaching upon their territory. Present membership, 372; some loss last year.

SCRANTON.

Located in southwestern Iowa. Meetings, 3; pastors, 3. Very few birthright members. Total membership, 469; growing.

SPRING BANK.

Located in northeastern Nebraska. Meetings, 5; pastors, 3. Present membership, 336; loss last year, 3. Spring Bank is a strong meeting.

SPRINGDALE.

Located in southeastern Iowa. Meetings, 5; pastors, 5. A strong quarterly meeting, but finding it difficult to hold its own on account of the prevalence of Danish Lutherans, and the fact that there are several different bodies calling themselves Friends. Present membership, 565; loss last year, 8.

UNION.

Located in north central Nebraska. Meetings, 4; pastors, 3. All meetings small, and mostly composed of new members. Present membership, 121; loss last year, 2.

WINNESHIEK.

Located in the adjoining corners of Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin. Meetings, 6; pastors, 4. Hesper is the largest of the meetings. Sawyer, in Wisconsin, is composed almost wholly of Scandinavian people. Valton and Oaks, in Wisconsin, and Kefron and Highland, in Minnesota, are small meetings. Membership, 319.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

INTERCESSORY PRAYER.

BY RICHARD HAWORTH.

"Jesus Christ is the same to-day as He was yesterday, and as He will be forever." Heb. 13: 8 (twentieth century translation). God and His laws are unchangeable. They are fixed and immutable, but large enough to fit the universe to the minutest detail and give His children everywhere access to God in intercessory prayer. One of God's fixed laws is a law of change. The wind blowing a fire kindles the flames; blowing harder extinguishes them; blowing upon the sand heaps it up, then, changing, spreads it out again. The gentle zephyr woe the fertile soil and it brings forth its fragrance and beauty in flower and landscape; the piercing norther reverses it all. The sun's rays passing through a prism display the beauty of the rainbow, but lose their power of warmth; passing through the lens nothing of the rainbow beauty is seen, but their heat is so concentrated as to focus on a given point and strike fire. The laws of light and heat remain the same; the prism, or lens effect is produced in the application. God's laws are spiritual as well as temporal, and their application to the spirit world produces just as marked changes in the lives of spiritual beings, but God remains unchangeable.

Communion is but one phase of prayer, and without intercession would narrow it down to simple worship. It is true that that is much more than many Christians make of prayer, but that is not enough. The prayers of Christians should be effective in the lives of other people as well as their own. Jas. 5: 16-18 says: "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working. Elijah was a man of like passions with us, and he prayed fervently that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth for three years and six months. And he prayed again; and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit."

God's law of prayer is "Ask and ye shall receive." Looking at the same statement negatively, and it seems that if we do not ask we will not receive many of the things that God expects us to enjoy; that He has hidden away certain great truths; and that the best gems of thought are secreted from our knowledge until carefully sought after. "God has chosen to leave a great many things undone," says Prof. W. W. White, "except as man prays and thus co-operates with Him." God accomplishes a great many things only as we pray. His law of continuity is such that certain events will transpire unless man, by prayer, throws himself in the way of change and brings another greater law to bear on the events and produces different results in the lives of those included in the prayer. Phillips Brooks says, "Prayer is not conquering God's reluctance, but utilizing God's willingness."

Moses, in Exodus 32: 7-14, furnishes a splendid illustration of one who prays in communion and then goes out and changes things by intercessory prayer. God said to Moses, "Let Me alone that my wrath may wax hot against them, and I will make of thee a great nation." Then Moses, in a disinterested manner, so far as anything of a personal nature is concerned, approached God with arguments why God should not do the thing suggested. "Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, saying, 'for evil did He bring them forth to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth.'" He then went on and reminded God of his promise to Abraham, Isaac and Israel, and plead with Jehovah to spare the people, throwing himself, with all his ability into God's original plan of making a great nation of Abraham's descendants, and God honored him by granting his petition. It was the unselfishness and intercession of Moses that spared the people.

Christ spent many hours in prayer and communion with His Father, sometimes whole nights. In Matt. 14: 23, we find that after a remarkably strenuous day, "and after He had sent the multitudes away, He went up into the mountain apart to pray." Of all the times when we feel the need of quiet and rest in sleep, it is after a day of constant strain. We hasten to our room and fling ourselves on a couch or into bed and lose ourselves in sleep, and there replenish our wasted strength. Not so with Christ. He hastens to the presence of His Father for communion and rest in Him. The long night vigil is his rest. He refreshes Himself by a prolonged prayer service following a hard day's toil. We often feel that there is no more service for us till we have stopped and rested. He went and rested in communion with His Father. Prayer to Him was rest; to us it is often times a wearisome task. The need of communion with His Father was to Him the paramount need, and He permitted nothing to supersede it. No natural demand of the human body was permitted to hinder the greater need of satisfying the soul.

This rule of His shows something of God's idea of prayer and its relation to the things of life. God changes things in connection with the life of Christ in proportion as He prays. Notice how Jesus considers His relation to God when He says, Jno. 8:28, "I do nothing of Myself," and again, Jno. 6:38, "I am come down from heaven, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me." This will of God Jesus obtained in prayer.

There is a secret somewhere; a key to Jesus' success. The disciples began to observe it and wonder. Evidently they began to connect His power with His prayer life, and one day they said to Him, "Lord, teach us to pray." He complied at once, for He came to earth to do God's will, and it is God's will that His children should know how to approach Him with their petitions. He gave them definite instructions and several illustrations, showing how man should approach God and how speedily He will answer; then toward the close of His ministry He gave them the great lessons of intercessory prayer, as shown in His talks and prayer in John, chapters 13 to 17, and again specifically in Matt. 18:19, 20, where He says, "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven." He is here teaching the relation that should exist between brethren.

They should be one in sympathy and spirit, and if so, they may ask for anything they choose and receive it. If the basis of agreement can be discovered, the assurance of an answer is clear. Another translation of the word is symphonize, i. e. if the request of the two produces harmony it shall be granted. In music you can detect the difference between harmony and discord. Two sounds are produced. You listen and say they make discord. Again two tones ring out and you say they chord, or symphonize, or produce harmony. The tones are so nearly alike that you cannot explain the difference, but in the one case they agree and the other they disagree. You note the harmony in one case and call it music; in the other you note the discord and call it noise. Just so it is in prayer. If the two symphonize their petition is granted, if not their petition is simply so much noise. How simple, and yet so many fail! All is assured when the heart attitude and life are right. It is not so much what we know about how to pray as that the heart attitude toward God is right and that we work entirely in harmony with God's will. Put in other language Jesus was saying to his disciples, "Let your lives on earth so harmonize as to produce music in God's ear, and whatever your petition it will be granted." He was leading the disciples step by step to the same relation to God by adoption that he enjoyed by nature, and teaching them that in this relation they might ask at will and receive because it is God's good pleasure.

The united prayer of God's people is a great power in the salvation of men. God wills that all should be saved (1 Tim. 2:4), and explains carefully how man may work successfully to that end. He saves men through human agencies. "Now is the accepted time" for the salvation of the unsaved and Christians are too slack in intercessory prayer and right living. The prayers of the righteous produce miraculous changes in the lives of numerous people. As illustrations, witness the prayer of Chas. H. Spurgeon, at the request of a strange lady, for her wayward husband, far off at sea. The Holy Spirit took hold of the man, thousands of miles away, while the prayer was being offered and he returned a saved man; or the "Escape of the Spree," out in mid-ocean, in answer to the prayers of D. L. Moody and Gen. O. O. Howard and others on board the vessel; or Len G. Broughton, pastor of a large church in Atlanta, Ga., who, with six others, united to pray for the wickedest man in the city; and witness his marvelous conversion only a few weeks afterward; or the wife of a United States Representative a few years ago, he an infidel on the floor of the House at the time, the Holy Spirit suddenly touching his heart in answer to the united prayers of his wife and two other women at her home in the West; his later conversion, and present pastoral work in a Western town. Many other direct answers to prayer might be cited; great revivals where scores and hundreds have been saved; natural laws suspended for a time; lives transformed, property restored, and great changes produced, both physically and spiritually, all in accordance with God's fixed laws of change in answer to prayer. God grant that His children may spend more time in communion and intercessory prayer, then will the kingdom of God be more rapidly extended.

SKETCH OF THEODORE L. CUYLER.

(Concluded from last week.)

One of the most powerful pulpit orators of the times, he has also been a writer of ceaseless activity, and the same forcible and engaging characteristics which have distinguished his preaching have marked his published writings. These writings comprehend some 4,000 contributions of various kinds to the press, about 75 tracts or pamphlets, and a goodly number of volumes. Among his published volumes are "Thought Hives," "Stray Arrows," "The Empty Crib," "The Cedar Christian," "Heart Life," "Pointed Papers," "From the Nile to Norway," "God's Light on Dark Clouds," "Wayside Springs," "Newly Enlisted," "How to be a Pastor," "Right to the Point," "The Young Preacher," "Stirring the Eagle's Nest," "Christianity in the Home," "Beulah Land," and "Recollections of a Long Life." Representative selections from his writings have been published in foreign languages, and it is estimated that 200,000,000 copies of his articles have been published in various papers and magazines in this and other countries.

Dr. Cuyler has long held an honored position as a temperance advocate and writer. He became interested in the temperance cause during the earliest days of the total abstinence agitation. While visiting Europe, after his graduation from college, he attended a meeting in Glasgow, which was addressed by Father Theobald Mathew, the noble Irish apostle of temperance, and had the honor of speaking from the same platform by the invitation of the devoted priest, who warmly commended him for his effort. He has ever since been an uncompromising champion of total abstinence for the individual and repressive legislation against the liquor traffic as a matter of State policy. For eight years he held the position of president of the National Temperance Society and Publication House, resigning that office when he retired from his active pastoral duties in 1890. Some of his most successful and admired tracts are on the subject of temperance. One of these, entitled, "Somebody's Son," has attained a circulation of over 500,000 copies.

He has always manifested a hearty interest in public questions and affairs, contributing to their discussion, both by voice and pen. From his early training, associations, and reflection he became a warm believer in anti-slavery principles, and upon the formation of the Republican party identified himself with it. In 1856, when the Republicans made their Presidential fight, he was the author of various campaign documents circulated by the Young Men's Union in New York City. During the Civil War his church was a home of loyalty, and at the time of the terrible riots in New York City was guarded by order of the public authorities to protect it from the evil disposed.

Five years ago, upon his eightieth birthday, First month 10, 1902, he was the recipient of cordial manifestations of esteem and appreciation from the people of Brooklyn, and from countless friends and admirers throughout this country and the world. This year has been marked by a similar tribute, testifying to his continued popularity, and the peculiar influence and value of his personality and work.

Dr. Cuyler married, in 1853, Annie E., daughter of Hon. Joshua Mathiot, Newark, Ohio, a member of Congress, who declined the Governorship of Ohio. They have two living children—Theodore Ledyard Cuyler, treasurer of the Postal Telegraph Co., and Marv, wife of Dr. William S. Cheesman, Auburn, N. Y.

The following is a copy of the memorial presented to Dr. Cuyler by the officers of the National Temperance Society:

REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

Beloved Father and Friend: As representatives of the National Temperance Society, we delight to join in the congratulations and good wishes which crown your eighty-fifth birthday.

You were one of the honored founders of this society; once its president, and always its best exponent and inspiration. During all your ministry you have been a leader of the temperance host, and your bugle-note has never failed to be true and clear.

Your name and words will be treasured not only in the annals of the National Society, but also in the history of the temperance reform throughout the land.

We are grateful that you have been permitted to see with your own eyes the advancing triumph of the principles you have so long and ardently advocated, and we believe your writings and example will hasten the day of final victory.

Praying that you may still be spared to us in a fruitful and happy old age, we remain, in behalf of the society,

Your admiring followers and fellow-workers, D. Stuart Dodge, D. D., William T. Wardwell, Theophilus A. Brouwer, David J. Burrell, D.D., Joel G. Van Cise, Alfred L. Manierre, Cleland Boyd McAfee, D.D., John W. Cummings, committee

A STRENUOUS, USEFUL LIFE.*

Dr. Edward H. Magill, the former president of Swarthmore College, has, in his eighty-second year, published his recollections of his sixty-five years in the profession of teaching. There is in his book much of encouragement for young men. It is refreshing to read of the earnest, determined efforts he made to fit himself for what he felt was his life calling—efforts which were crowned with success. We fear not a few young men of to-day would, under similar circumstances, give up the fight. He tells, how, after beginning to teach at the early age of sixteen, he advanced, step by step, till he was first assistant in Friends' Central School, now at Fifteenth and Race Streets, Philadelphia. Thence he went to the well-known school of Benjamin Hallowell, at Alexandria, Va. He had been educated at country schools, with two years at Westtown. After the not unusual practice of those days among Friends, he had learned no language but English. At Alexandria he realized that if he intended to be a successful teacher his preparation had been wholly inadequate. He therefore began the study of Greek and Latin without a teacher. He was then twenty-three years old. Two of his fellow-instructors encouraged him, and, in addition to his own regular work of instruction, and share of governing the school, devoted all his spare time to study. He soon was convinced, that in order to enter Yale College, he must have more schooling, and so, in 1848, entered Williston Academy, Eastampton, Mass., as a pupil. His father, though a well-to-do farmer, could not afford to help him much, and so young Magill determined to depend, as much as possible, upon the small amount he had been able to save. He practised the closest economy and tells us, "I bought molasses, and kept myself on bread and molasses, only, for many weeks at a time. My expenses were thus reduced to about 50 or 60 cents a week." He entered the freshman class at Yale without conditions on his twenty-fifth birthday.

After a successful year, he went to Brown University, because that college allowed students to complete the course for the A.B. degree in less than four years, and he felt that it was important for him to spend as little time at college as possible. He believed that he could get his degree in one year. "Young man," said President Wayland before whom he laid his plans, "What you propose to do is possible, but not probable." He made the effort and succeeded, graduating in 1852 with the Bachelor's degree. So greatly had his industry and ability impressed his instructors that, through their recommendation, he was, soon after taking his degree, appointed classical teacher in the Providence High School. After eight years as principal of that school, he was invited to become sub-master in the celebrated Boston Latin School, and remained there the same period. He was then invited to become the principal of the preparatory department of Swarthmore College, which was about to be opened. Hitherto, his work since leaving college had been wholly outside of Friends; this was an opportunity for work among Friends of that branch (Race Street) to which he belonged, and he felt it must be accepted. As the college could not be opened for nearly two years, he went abroad for preparation and study. He entered upon his new work in the fall of 1869, and in 1871, upon the resignation of Dr. Edward Parrish, Edward H. Magill was appointed president of Swarthmore College, a post which he filled with ability for nineteen years, resigning on account of poor health in 1890. He retained a professorship, then a lectureship, finally severing his connection with the institution, for which he had done so much, in 1903.

The book is a personal record, and not the least interesting parts of it are the tributes which he pays to his old instructors. Another attractive feature is the candor with which he acknowledged his errors and mistakes in judgment. He was always willing to learn and to profit by what he saw and heard. Kindly feeling and consideration for others is manifest all through his narrative, and details of his home life are few and far between.

MARTHA E. PRATT.

The passing away of Martha E. Pratt, on the 16th ult., brings to a close a long and useful life. We reprint a short account of her life, taken from the Indianapolis Star:

"Martha E. Pratt was one of the oldest citizens of Indianapolis. She was born at Thorndike, Me., Tenth month 31, 1817. From childhood to old age, her life was marked with many traits that conduced to make her a very remarkable character. She was a life-long student of the Bible and had carefully read it through three times before she was twenty-one years of age. At the age of twenty-five, she became the wife of Joseph H. Pratt, and, when married, she had, as the result of her own spinning and weaving, enough household linen, consisting of table linens, toweling and sheeting, to last her for eighteen years. She was a remarkable knitter, in this way making undergarments, shawls and the like, and on one occasion knit five double mittens for men in one day. She was an artist with her needle, having made many pieces of fancy patchwork after she was eighty years of age.

During her early married life she served as doctor and nurse on many occasions for her neighbors in the pioneer community, which was then her home.

She was of a literary turn of mind, being especially fond of the poets, and until the time of her last sickness kept quite conversant with the forward movements of her church and the current news of the day. But the traits that marked her most were her graces born of a remarkable Christian experience. She was a co-laborer with her husband for forty years in a very active life in the ministry. She was a life-long member of the Friends' Church, and for nearly sixty years was an elder in that body. She was the mother of four children, three of whom survive her. Her son, Charles E. Pratt, was an attorney of prominence, read his Bible in 13 languages, and was at one time president of the Council in Boston. Two of her daughters, Jennie P. Woollard and Elizabeth Grinnell, the latter an author of considerable note, reside in Pasadena, Cal.

Her youngest child, with whom she made her home, is Hannah Pratt Jessup, whose work in the ministry has made her well known to Friends from Maine to California.

Martha E. Pratt's last sickness covered five months and a half, during which time she was a great sufferer, and through it all she was never heard to complain. She knew her close was drawing near, talked much about it and was cheerful to the end. She was conscious to the last moment of her life, and quietly fell asleep.

LESSON III.

FOURTH MONTH 21, 1907.

JOSEPH SOLD BY HIS BRETHREN.

Genesis 37: 5-28.

GOLDEN TEXT.—For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. Jas. 3: 16.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 15.—Joseph loved and hated. Gen. 37: 1-11.
 Third-day, Fourth mo. 16.—Joseph sold by his brethren. Gen. 37: 12-28.
 Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 17.—Jacob deceived. Gen. 37: 29-36.
 Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 18.—Joseph finds favor. Gen. 39: 1-6.
 Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 19.—Sin remembered. Gen. 42: 14-22.
 Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 20.—Affliction for good. Job. 5: 6-17.
 First-day, Fourth mo. 21.—In God's hand. Ps. 31: 1-15.

Time.—Uncertain, possibly somewhere between 1700 and 1650 B. C.

Places.—Hebron, about 20 miles south of Jerusalem; Shechem, in Samaria, about 50 miles north of Hebron; Dothan, about 12 miles north of Shechem.

Persons.—Jacob; Joseph, represented as seventeen years old; Benjamin, probably about ten. The other sons, considerably older than Joseph.

The lesson begins the third great division of Genesis, which, with the exception of chapter 38, which is in parenthesis, is wholly devoted to the history of Joseph and circumstances connected with his life. Jacob falls into the background, and, although considerable space is given to his history, Joseph is the chief character, and interest centers in him.

The character of Joseph is one of the finest in the Old Testament, and as nearly a faultless one as is therein portrayed. "He is the true son, the true brother, the true servant. Loyal and faithful, disinterested and sincere, modest and considerate, he wins the esteem of all rightminded persons with whom he has to do. He is obedient to duty in whatever position he finds himself."

5. "Dreamed a dream." The importance dreams held in the old dispensation is well-known. It was natural for the lad to tell his brethren. "Hated him the more." Their hatred was caused (1) by the fact that Jacob loved him more than he did them, which was natural (verse 3), though it was not wise in Jacob to show it. Joseph was not only the "son of his old age," but the child of his best loved wife, Rachel, and was also in every way satisfactory to his father. Besides this, as the son of a wife, he occupied a higher position than the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, the concubines.

6-8. "Binding sheaves in the field." This implies that Jacob and his household were not wholly pastoral, but partly agricultural, in their occupations. His brothers interpreted the dream as foretelling Joseph's future greatness; that they did not ridicule him indicates that his character was such that a future of that kind was not impossible.

9. "Eleven stars." Indicating his eleven brothers.

10. "Told it to his father." Jacob also interpreted the dream in the same way as the younger men had, and rebukes Joseph, because it was wholly contrary to Oriental etiquette and custom that a father should ever make obeisance to a child. "I and thy mother." This would imply that Rachel was living; but see chapter 35: 19. It is one of the statements that cannot, with our knowledge, be explained quite satisfactorily.

11. "His father kept the saying in mind." R. V. Pondered it in his heart. He felt sure it meant something and turned it over and over, questioning what it might mean.

12. "Shechem." Jacob's sons had conquered Shechem (see Gen. 34), but the fact that they would take their flocks 50 or 60 miles away from home shows that Jacob and his household must have been numerous and strong.

13. That the men and their flocks were not in a perfectly safe place is shown by Jacob's desire to hear of their welfare. Note Joseph's prompt obedience.

14. "Go now." R. V. The command is thus decided and abrupt. "Come to Shechem." It would be about a three days' journey from Hebron.

15. "Found him." We should say, "met him."

16. "Where they are feeding their flocks." R. V.

17. "Dothan." "Two wells." The same is preserved in Tell-Dothan, where there are two wells still.

18. "They conspired to kill him." The sight of Joseph coming suggested the thought of putting him out of their way.

19. "This dreamer." Literally, "Master of dreams," said, doubtless, in scorn.

20. They plan a not improbable story to tell their father. "Some pit." "One of the pits." R. V. Undoubtedly cisterns for holding water, probably dry at this season. They were bottle-shaped, and one could not get out without help.

21. "Reuben." The eldest born, son of Leah. "Delivered him out of their hand." Saved his life.

22. "Pit." Cistern as above. "That he might deliver him out of their hand, to restore him to his father." R. V.

23. "The coat of many colors." The Hebrew word thus translated is used nowhere else, and its exact meaning is not known. Many of the best scholars believe that it should be translated "a tunic with sleeves, and reaching to the feet." The ordinary tunic was sleeveless, and did not extend below the knees.

24. "Pit." Cistern. There are many at this day in the neighborhood of Dothan. "No water in it," but doubtless the bottom was covered with slime and mud—a noisome place, indeed.

25. "Sat down to eat bread." Possibly some of the very things which Joseph had brought. "Behold a caravan of Ishmaelites was coming from Gilead." Amer. R. V. The Ishmaelites were not distant relatives of Joseph. Dothan was on the great road to Egypt, which ran past Beisan, Jezreel, through the plain of Sharon, and Lydda, and so on to Egypt. "Spicery." Gum tragacanth, probably. "Balm." A regular product of Gilead. Jer. 8:22; 46:11. Myrrh. Ladanum, a fragrant gum. These gums were used for medicine, incense, and embalming.

26, 27. Judah now appears on the scene, and, by exciting the cupidity of his brethren, saves Joseph's life. "Conceal his blood." Compare Gen. 4:10.

28. In this verse there appears to be another account of Joseph's being carried away, kidnapped by Midianites. Some refer the pronoun "they" to Joseph's brethren, but the former explanation is more consonant with verse 29, also with the statement in Genesis 40:15, that Joseph was "stolen away."

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Acts 7:9.
2. "Obedience is the organ of spiritual vision."
3. "How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds Makes ill deeds done."

TOPIC FOR FOURTH MONTH TWENTY-FIRST, 1907.

WISE WAYS TO READ WISE BOOKS.

Prov. 4:1-9.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 15.—Wisdom that preserves. Prov. 2:1-22.
Third-day, Fourth mo. 16.—A call to the young. Prov. 8:1-21.
Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 17.—Loving instruction. Prov. 12:1-15.
Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 18.—Reading and keeping. Eccl. 8:1-7.
Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 19.—A wise reader. Acts 8:26-40.
Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 20.—An inspired writer. Rev. 1:1-20.

When the priest bound wrist and brow with phylacteries, on which were written portions of the law, he was symbolizing the fact that the hand and heart of the wise require its guidance. Meditation on the law is urged, and the writing of its precepts on the tables of the mind and heart; while abiding in and obeying the words of Christ are set forth as both seed and fruit of the highest wisdom.

Knowledge may see the way, but it is wisdom that walks in it; and who shall be our guide? The experiences of a hundred generations are at our command, if we will but acquaint ourselves with them. The tested teachings of the wisest of earth's sages are in the hands of every one who reads the words of Moses and David, of Isaiah and Paul, and, above all, of Jesus Christ.

But the thousand-fold applications and testimonies and inspirations, that may be ours by a perusal of what are called secular writings, can not be overlooked either. The lives of men like Livingstone and Carey, like Lincoln and Gladstone, and of women like Frances Willard and Mary Lyon, are of the greatest worth; while the hand of God in history can not be left unnoticed by any who would give Him the honor due Him and His rightful place as Lord of the nations.

New books, without number, pour from the presses of to-day and a few of them must be read by those who wish to know the progress of the world in wisdom and right knowledge. But most of our reading can well be in books that have had enough intrinsic worth to outlive the generation that produced them. That fact, alone, reduces vastly the bulk of the literature to be considered. Books that beget doubt, that are founded on "ifs," like Satan's approaches to Christ in the wilderness; books that "leave a bad taste in the mouth," that lower our regard for home and womanhood, or for Christ and His church, that make us think tolerantly of impurity and irreverence—such books have no more place in the hands of most—perhaps of any—of us than has a typhoid germ in a baby's diet.

The problem of finding time to read even a few good books often seems difficult of solution. It might be a help to others if each one would report to his or her society the plans that have been found successful in making use of the flying moments. We may have to regulate the amount of time we can allow to the reading of newspapers and periodicals; while the art of making small and light volumes may be looked to to supply editions of worthy books that can be used as conveniently as has been the "light literature" that is so often used to pass a leisure moment.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

MYOPY.

A painting rare before me hung,
A stretch of sea and land;
Around the world its fame had rung,
Wrought by a master hand.

But looking close what daubs and dabs,
What myriad mysteries glare—
Reds, greens, blues, and drabs,
Beneath a sky most fair.

What beauty can there be in this,
A crumbling pile of blocks—
Do I see clearly, or do I miss,
Outline of sea and land and rocks?

Stand back and get perspective view;
Let softened sunlight fall;
Ah, now behold! in rarest hue,
Rests nature's harmony on all!

In weaker moments oft we look,
On Human-nature's face,
And claim to read as open book,
Her varied forms and dearth of grace.

Stand back and get a higher view!
Let God's sweet sunlight fall
Upon the soul and heart renew,
Then changed the vision all.

Standing up on Faith's holy ground,
All blends in the Creator's plan;
In God's eternal fatherhood is bound
The brotherhood of man.

St. Louis.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

A series of meetings of two weeks' duration, conducted by Willis Bond, has just closed in Brooklyn, Ind. Fifty-three were converted, some of whom were addicted to the drink habit.

Morton C. Pearson, Indianapolis, preached the Baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the High School at Kennard, Ind. First-day evening, Third month 24th. The attendance was large and the services inspiring.

More than $35 has passed through our hands this week for the famine-stricken Chinese. Joseph Elkinton, through whom we are sending out our contributions, reports that he has already forwarded $2,385 to Russia, $1,200 to China.

There will be thirty-nine candidates for degrees at the annual commencement exercises, which will be held at Earlham College this year. Of this number two will graduate from the department of music, and two will be given the master of arts degree. The remainder will be given the regular bachelor of arts degree.

Robert L. Kelly, president of Earlham College, is one of four members of the Indiana State Board of Education appointed on a committee to interpret the recent educational legislation in that State, and provide means for carrying such legislation into effect. The laws provide for far-reaching advancement, and are the most important passed in Indiana for thirty years.

The Lumbwa Industrial Mission of British East Africa is in need of the services of an expert agriculturist. The trustees of the Arthington Fund, Leeds, England, have granted £200 per year for five years for the furtherance of this branch of the work. Those feeling a call to such a labor can ascertain full particulars by writing to Willis R. Hotchkiss, director, care of Lumbwa Industrial Mission, Lumbwa, British East Africa.

Johan Marcussen is now visiting in and about Philadelphia. On the evening of the 4th inst. he met with a group of interested Friends at the home of Rufus M. Jones, and gave an account of people now in Iowa, who some years ago migrated from Norway. They discovered what they thought was true Christian worship for themselves, and found later that they were in complete harmony with Friends, and united with the Society.

Emeline H. Tuttle and son, Joseph Tuttle, have removed from Indianapolis, Ind., to New Orleans, where Joseph Tuttle is now engaged in business. The service of Emeline H. Tuttle with Indianapolis Friends has been most acceptable indeed. She has won the love and regard of all, but especially the young people of the church. While she carried the responsibilities of her own home, she found time to engage frequently in the ministry and assist in all the departments of church work.

An interesting program given by the men of the congregation took the place of the regular First-day evening service, the 31st ult., at Bloomingdale, Ind. The theme for the evening was "Missions." Edward M. Woodard presided. Edmund Hill gave the devotional exercises. The following topics were discussed: "The Brotherhood of Man," J. R. Hinshaw; "The Great Commission," John Osborn; "Men as Missionaries," E. T. Coleman; "Comparative Statistics," Cloyce Maris; "Giving," Wallace Newlin; "Our Share," Mahlon Lindley; "Business Methods in Missions," E. B. Morris; "What Civilization Owes to Missions," Carlton Cox and William J. Reagan. A male quartet furnished the music. An Easter offering for missions was received.

Walnut Monthly Meeting, Kansas, has been favored with revival services in its two local meetings, C. Frank Walker, Leavenworth, spending two weeks in each place. The first revival, held during the latter part of Second month, in Oak Creek Meeting, resulted in 37 professed conversions and renewals, mostly young people. A Christian Endeavor Society was organized, and 50 declared their intention of joining. The meeting is in good condition, and Flora Bean has been chosen for pastoral work. The revival at Walnut Meeting was hindered by bad roads, disagreeable weather and dark nights, notwithstanding 24 confessed conversion or renewal. George O. and Amanda Copeland are doing the pastoral work, and the meeting is building them a home. As a result of the revivals, nine have united with Friends and 36 more are candidates. Some are associate members seeking full membership.

The meeting near Thorntown, Indiana, has been favored with a gracious visitation from the Lord. Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame have just closed a series of meetings at that place. A communication from there reads as follows:

"Those loyal and devoted friends reminded us of I Thess., i-5: 'For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit, and in much assurance. Their ministry is not only thoroughly scriptural, but their long, varied and successful work as 'soul winners' afford them a rich fund of experience from which they draw beautiful illustrations, which they use with great skill in holding forth the word of life. 'The faith that was once delivered to the saints.' Not for many years has our meeting had such a mighty uplift. Backsliders were reclaimed; many sinners were converted, as well as numbers from other churches were led into greater liberty in the Lord. More than twenty, a good number heads of families, will unite with Friends as a result of the meetings. J. Farland Randolph, Emma G. Randolph, pastors."

The following is taken from The Graphic, Newberg, Ore.:

"Some time ago President McGrew tendered his resignation as president of Pacific College, on account of continued ill health, and the resignation has finally been accepted by the board. His physician says he needs to throw off the responsibility of college work, and consequently he has decided to take up some out-door employment for a time. Just what it will be he does not know at present, but he is offering his home for sale with a view of making a change. A large circle of very warm friends of President McGrew and his family will regret to learn that he has reached this decision, and will hope that he may yet conclude to remain in Newberg. Wherever he may go the one desire of his Newberg friends will be that he may again be restored to perfect health. The work of the college is going forward very satisfactorily under the efficient supervision of Prof. F. K. Jones. Steps are being taken by the board to find a competent man to fill the vacancy, but so far no selection has been made."

Levi Gregory has been making his life count at Oakland, Cal. Less than eighteen months ago the first Friends' meeting was held there in a tent. During the winter months meetings were held in a dwelling, then in the tent again, until a new chapel was enclosed in Eleventh month last. Since then the chapel has been finished, and on the 17th ult. was formally dedicated clear of debt. The membership is small as yet, but the outlook is good. The Oakland Enquirer says in part:

"At the dedication of the church enough money was raised to wipe out the indebtedness and also beautify the interior of the building. It is a very simple structure, but exhibits the skill of a carpenter who was educated for the pastorate. He worked a great deal of the time alone with hammer and saw, and in his labor of love rejoiced to see the building grow into proportions of a stately house of worship, costing about $2,000. The lot for the new church was given by Addison W. Naylor, Berkeley. Levi Gregory was the orator of the day. Others who participated in the dedication services were Lindley A. Wells, Berkeley, who read from the Scriptures; Rebecca Naylor delivered the dedicatory prayer; Leda Gregory and Carl Seawell rendered vocal solos."

Friends of Indianapolis Meeting have had the very great pleasure of listening recently to the presentation of "Rip Van Winkle," by Charles F. Underhill, Brooklyn, N. Y. The reading was highly appreciated by a very large audience of Friends, and revealed remarkable skill and power on the part of the reader. Charles F. Underhill is a Friend, and very acceptably attended the Bible School and meeting at Indianapolis, 24th ult.

The work of the First Friends' Meeting, Indianapolis, continues with ever increasing interest and good results. Some of the departments are in better condition than ever before. The Bible School, under the direction of William P. Socwell, has grown both in interest and attendance during the year. The average attendance is about 50 more than last year, the number present last First-day being 219. A men's social union has been organized recently, with a membership of about 75 men. Meetings are held monthly, and the union promises much along the line of practical work of men for men. The Sabbath morning meetings for worship have been unusual times of blessing this year. There has been a steady increase in the attendance, especially of children and young people. These indications furnish cause for great thankfulness.

The meeting at Worcester, Mass., is in a very prosperous condition in every way. The spirit of God has been particularly precious this winter in quickening the membership, and in bringing in those from the outside. There were a number of conversions and renewals in the meetings before the great simultaneous meetings held by Wilbur Chapman and Dr. Ostrom in Second month, in which the Friends joined with much spiritual profit. At the last monthly meeting eight were received into active membership, and three as associate members upon request. Two were transferred from the associate to the active membership. These were all given a public welcome at the morning meeting, Easter. It is the practice in this meeting to give public recognition to the change from the associate list to the active list, the same as in the reception of new members. Excavations for a new brick and stone meeting-house were begun Third month 28th, and by First month, 1908, Friends expect to be located in the building, modern in every particular and suited to the needs of a working Friends meeting. The old frame structure, built in 1847, has been moved to the north side of the lot, where it will be used until the new building is completed. A cordial invitation is extended to any readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND who may chance to be in the city of Worcester at any time. The meeting-house is centrally located, being on the corner of Chatham and Oxford Streets. Earle J. Harold will complete his third year as pastor in this meeting the first of next Sixth month.

The enrollment of pupils during the current school year at Westtown Boarding School, Pa., has been 211, nearly equally divided between boys and girls, but the actual attendance at the school at present is a trifle less than this amount.

The school receives as pupils only those who have membership in the Society of Friends, and of those now in attendance two-thirds are members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and one-third come from other yearly meetings, ranging from Canada to North Carolina, and from New England to Iowa and Kansas.

The last one in the regular Sixth-day evening course of 16 lectures was given about two weeks ago by Dr. Stanley Coulter, of Purdue University, Indiana. His subject was, "The Successful Life," and he gave a most earnest and inspiring address on the elements of true success.

The various literary societies of the school have recently held a series of debates on the question, Resolved, That the municipalities of the United States should own and operate their street car lines." In the final contest the team from the W. C. P. S., upholding the negative side, won the debate.

The annual Visitors' Day occurred the 29th ult., and 300 or more visitors availed themselves of the opportunity of inspecting the school and its work. Patrons and prospective patrons, with their children, were largely in evidence, and their purpose in coming was attested by the large attendance in the class-rooms and elsewhere. Regular class-room recitations occurred in the morning, and after lunch the work in the shop, the chemical and botanical laboratories, and in the cooking room took place. An exhibition of boys' and girls' gymnasium exercises followed by boys' swimming work in the natatorium closed the day.

The Moses Brown school grounds are about to be embellished by a memorial gateway, the gift of Joshua L. Baily, Philadelphia, and his five sons, in memory of Theodate (Lang) Baily, the wife and mother, who was a pupil at the school from 1844 to 1852.

The new gateway will be on Lloyd Avenue, near the crest of the hill between Hope Street and Arlington Avenue, the site of the old entrance, which was in continuous use from the opening of the school, in 1819, until about ten years ago.

The gateway will be well set back from the street, and will be circular in outline, the wings curving toward the street. It will provide for a carriage entrance 18 feet wide, with good paths on each side, 3 feet 8 inches wide. The design of the gateway is simple and artistic. The pillars are to be of red pressed brick with granite bases and cap stones. The center pillars are to be surmounted with iron frame globes fitted for electric lights.

The gates themselves are of plain wrought iron bars, relieved at the top by scroll work and spear points. On the west wing will be placed a bronze tablet with an appropriate inscription. The gates are to be completed in time for presentation to the school on Commencement Day, Sixth month 14th.

It is proposed to build an iron fence on granite posts on Lloyd Avenue, both east and west from the new gateway, and invite the graduating classes to assume the cost of sections of this fence. In connection with the building of the gateway the old avenue will be reconstructed and restored, and the whole work when completed will present a scheme of architectural harmony.

John U. Harkness, who was superintendent, and his wife, who was matron of White's Institute, near Wabash, Ind., have severed their connection with the institution, and are succeeded by James Moorman and wife. The following clipping from The Richmond Palladium gives some idea of the work:

"White's Institute is governed and owned exclusively by the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends. It was founded in 1853. The farm consists of 640 acres. Mr. White, the founder, wished the institution to be for the benefit of poor white children, but for years Indian children were educated here. Ten years ago the Indians were no longer accepted and the institution was again devoted to the care of white orphans.

Largely through the influence of Superintendent Harkness several counties in Indiana were induced to do away with their orphanages when he took charge, and all of the wards from these counties are sent to White's Institute.

Wabash, Howard, Kosciusko, Posey, Wayne and Hendricks Counties now send all their children to this institution, and have no orphanages. About 26 other counties send a large number of their orphans here, and as a result, children from all over the State are sent here. The institution is merely self-supporting, being a charitable organization, and orphans sent are maintained until they are old enough to care for themselves.

Superintendent Harkness and Judge Stubbs, Indianapolis, inaugurated the plan of sending children from the Juvenile Courts to the institution, and as a result there are 70 of these children now here. They come largely from Indianapolis, Anderson, Marion and Wabash. The work of reforming these boys has proven very successful, and as a result the institution has gained a great deal of prominence in the courts of the State."

She was a daughter of Abram and Esther Sutton, De Ruyter, N. Y., a birthright Friend, and a member and elder of Chappaqua Monthly Meeting, New York. She was an earnest worker in the cause of temperance, and was one of the prime movers in the Women's Christian Temperance Union. She lived a consistent, upright Christian life, attending meeting regularly as long as her health permitted, and was beloved by a large circle of friends.

Texas has taken the lead in moral reform legislation. Governor Campbell recently signed a bill making gambling a felony in that State. The law provides a penitentiary sentence for any person convicted of gambling, and jail sentence for the owner of any building in which gambling devices are kept, and imprisonment for thirty days for any person found guilty of playing cards for a prize. Moral reformers from other States will watch with interest the practical working of this new law.

On the evening of the 5th Andrew Carnegie gave a reception to a motley crowd, including capitalists, manufacturers, bankers, merchants, publicists and laboring men. Men with horny palms mingled and chatted with those high in the commercial and industrial world. August Belmont made the principal speech of the evening, telling both labor and capital that hard times were coming, and that they should prepare. The occasion was designed to promote good feeling and better understanding among all classes, and afforded a great deal of pleasure to Andrew Carnegie and wife, who are great lovers of peace.

The public has been watching with considerable interest for the last two years the struggle which has been going on between the municipal authorities and the traction companies in Chicago. Mayor Dunne was elected on a platform favoring immediately municipal ownership, but after he came into office he found it impossible to redeem his campaign pledges; nor has he been able to successfully carry out any of his policies during his administration. The election last week resulted in the selection of his

STRENGTH

WITHOUT OVERLOADING THE STOMACH.

The business man, especially, needs food in the morning that will not overload the stomach, but give mental vigor for the day.

Much depends on the start a man gets each day, as to how he may expect to accomplish the work on hand.

He can't be alert, with a heavy, fried-meat-and-potatoes breakfast requiring a lot of vital energy in digesting it.

A California business man tried to find some food combination that would not overload the stomach in the morning, but that would produce energy.

He writes:

"For years I was unable to find a breakfast food that had nutrition enough to sustain a business man without overloading his stomach, causing indigestion and kindred ailments.

"Being a very busy and also a very nervous man, I decided to give up breakfast altogether. But luckily I was induced to try Grape-Nuts.

"Since that morning I have been a new man; can work without tiring, my head is clear and my nerves strong and quiet.

"I find four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with one of sugar and a small quantity of cold milk make a delicious morning meal, which invigorates me for the day's business." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

opponent, Frederick A. Busse, who favors a twenty-year franchise for the street car companies. This probably ends the struggle for municipal ownership in Chicago.

PEACE.

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,

Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,

Given to redeem the human mind from error,

There were no need of arsenals or forts.

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!

And every nation, that should lift again

Its hand against a brother, on its forehead

Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain!

Down the dark future, through long generations,

The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;

And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,

I hear once more the voice of Christ say, "Peace!"

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals

The blast of War's great organ shakes the skies!

But beautiful as songs of the immortals. The holy melodies of love arise.

—H. W. Longfellow.

THE VILLAGE STORE.

A generation ago the village store was the center of social life for the farmers of the surrounding neighborhood. In a recent number of the Richmond (Ind.) Sun-Telegram, Byron Williams describes this center in verse. The concluding stanzas are:

The government is groomed and spanked

And made to stand up prim and straight;

"Judge" Haller, stopping for some plug.

Discusses "pints" of town and state—

His honor rules on benches four, Yet deigns to argue at the store.

They sit and spit and smoke their pipes, Grave strategists and sparkling wits;

Some hit the cracks and others don't, Yet every man he sits and spits—

While time floats to the other shore, And darkness hides the village store;

Old grocery shop, we love you yet, Mid palaces of stone and steel;

And some day we will sit and spit Beside thy fragrant onion peel—

"Just restin'" at the open door Of that old, corner, village store.

If experts say that you're insane,

And you don't think it true, Some other experts you retain,

To take your point of view.

ALFRED HENRY LEWIS

Has written an interesting article, entitled

"My Conversion to Life Insurance" of which the following is an excerpt:

"For a first confident matter, I discovered that Life Insurance has been brought to a science. Every chance has been measured and accounted for; every last possibility eliminated of the company breaking down. The process of Life Insurance, as practiced by The Prudential for example, is mathematically exact, and as certain in its results as two and two are of making four. Given a policy plus death, the death-loss is paid, and that promptly.

True, my doubtful friend, all things of this world are liable to fail or to fade. Crowns rust, thrones decay, and the sponge of time wipes nations from the map. And yet, as men use the word, such companies as The Prudential are sure, since they found themselves on investments that are as the blood and sinew of the country. The government must fall before they fall; and the policies they issue, and the promises they make, have all the vital enduring qualities of a government bond.

The Prudential, that Gibraltar of Life Insurance, attracted me. I had heard it best spoken of. Besides, its controlling spirit was Senator Dryden—whose intelligence had been its architect, just as his integrity was and is its corner-stone.

This article, a most interesting and valuable exposition of Life Insurance, should be read from start to finish. A copy of it will be sent free of charge to any reader of this publication who will write.

TEACH ME THE TRUTH

Teach me the truth, Lord, though it put to flight
My cherished dreams and fondest fancy's play ;
Give me to know the darkness from the light,
The night from day.

Teach me the truth, Lord, though my heart may break,
In casting out the falsehood for the true ;
Help me take my shattered life, and make Its actions new.

Teach me the truth, Lord, though my feet may fear
The rocky path that opens out to me ;
Rough it may be, but let the way be clear
That leads to thee.

Teach me the truth, Lord. When false creeds decay,
When man-made dogmas vanish in the night,
Then, Lord, on thee my darkened soul shall stay,
Thou living light.

CLEAR-HEADED

HEAD BOOKKEEPER MUST BE RELIABLE.

The chief bookkeeper is a large business house, in one of our great Western cities, speaks of the harm coffee did for him:

"My wife and I drank our first cup of Postum Coffee a little over two years ago, and we have used it ever since, to the entire exclusion of tea and the old kind of coffee. It happened in this way:

"About three and a half years ago I had an attack of pneumonia, which left a memento in the shape of dyspepsia, or rather, to speak more correctly, neuralgia of the stomach. My 'cup of cheer' had always been coffee or tea, but I became convinced, after a time, that they aggravated my stomach trouble. I happened to mention the matter to my grocer one day and he suggested that I give Postum Food Coffee a trial.

"Next day it came, but the cook made the mistake of not boiling it sufficiently, and we did not like it much. This was, however, soon remedied, and now we like it so much that we will never change back. Postum, being a food beverage instead of a drug, has been the means of curing my stomach trouble. I verily believe, for I am a well man to-day and have used no other remedy.

"My work as chief bookkeeper in our company's branch houses here is of a very confining nature. During my coffee-drinking days I was subject to nervousness and 'the blues' in addition to my sick spells. These have left me since I began using Postum Food Coffee, and I can conscientiously recommend it to those whose work confines them to long hours of severe mental exertion." "There's a Reason." Art circles in Philadelphia are enthusiastic over the prospect of having one of the greatest art collections in the United States. One of the city's wealthy capitalists, P. A. B. Widener, has offered to erect a magnificent gallery if the city will provide a suitable site on the new Parkway.

The Indiana Anti-Saloon League has decided to conduct a campaign for two definite measures, First, for the county feature of the remonstrance law, and, Second, for a constitutional amendment absolutely prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the State of Indiana, to be submitted to the vote of the people at the earliest possible moment. Their slogan is, "Indiana a dry State by 1912."

It has just been learned that Helen M. Gould is the kind philanthropist who has purchased 100,000 acres of land near Greeley, Colo., to be sub-divided into homesteads for poor families from New York tenements. She expects to spend $100,000 for farm implements, seed and fencing. Beneficiaries will be allowed to make easy payments, if they are diligent, but the shiftless will be weeded out. There will be a corps of agricultural and sanitary instructors, a library and reading room and pleasure grounds. There will be no requirements as to religion. Dairying and poultry raising will receive most attention at the start, and general farming and fruit raising will follow.

One of the most aggravating situations which has developed recently is the frequent attempts to wreck passenger trains on the Pennsylvania Lines near Pittsburgh, both in the State of Pennsylvania and Ohio. It has been almost impossible for the officers and detectives to locate offenders, and while several arrests have already been made, it is very doubtful whether they have captured the right parties. One boy was arrested, who testified that he made two attempts to wreck passenger trains for the mere excitement which would result. This seems, however, to be a mere circumstance, since the great number of attempts can only be explained by the supposition that a number of men are systematically working to accomplish this desperate end.

Our readers have doubtless followed, more or less closely, the proceedings of the trial of Harry K. Thaw for the murder of Stanford White, which has been carried on in New York City during the past two months and a half. The trial lasted sixty-five Court days, while the longest murder trial on record up to date was fifty-seven Court days. The defence spent $235,000 and the State over $73,000. The jury failed to agree, the majority favoring conviction. One of the most significant sentences uttered by the District Attorney in connection with the trial was a casual remark made to a friend after it was over. When told how badly the prisoner felt, he said, "I am sorry for the boy, but more so for his mother." This is the tragedy of crime. We cannot suffer alone for our misdeeds or reap our reward for right doing. We must think not alone of ourselves, but of ourselves in connection with others.

During the recent session of Congress an effort was made to give the Agricultural Department the power to definitely establish food standards. The provision was ruled out on the point of order in both Houses; but Senator Proctor, while admitting the validity of the technicality, declared that the character of the opposition and the great amount of lobbying against the provision convinced him that such a law should be enacted. Granting that his position is correct, it evidences one of two conditions, or both; either purchasers cannot be trusted to buy the kinds of food they should have, or sellers need watching in order to keep them from misrepresenting. Both of these conditions are evidences of weakness for which the American people should be ashamed. Are we coming to such a pass that the National Government must employ experts to make up for the poor judgment of purchasers on the one hand, and prevent the fraud of produce merchants on the other in order to enable the American people to secure the kind of food they ought to have?

CAMPAIGNS OF IGNORANCE.

There are few such terrible arraignments in history as that which Stephen makes of the Jewish traditional party. He gathers up their centuries of bigotry in one sweeping sentence, which must have made those "stiff-necked and uncircumcised" zealots before him wince as they listened: "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost."

It was literally true. There had never been a single gleam of fresh light in Jewish history that had not been met with furious resistance on the part of those who were at ease in their traditions. "Which of the prophets did not your fathers stone?" The only answer to that searching question was the gnashing of the teeth of the angry zealots, who were lined up there in front of him ready to stone one more prophet of the light.

"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," are the pathetic words of the Saviour in the presence of this same blind party, which resents interference with the comfortable system of their traditional religion. The Roman soldiers drove in the nails, but, as Christ recognizes from His cross, it was the traditional religion of His people that crucified Him. The crucifixion was one more chapter in the long story which Stephen's terrible sentence tells: "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost."

With tender, forgiving spirit, Christ puts His finger on the real cause of this outbreak against Him—the cause, too, of the outbreak against all prophets of the light—"they know not what they do." He knows that the leaders of the traditional party are blind. They are destroying their future, they are spoiling their only chance, they are flinging away their priceless jewel—it is done in sheer ignorance. But, alas, this ancient tragedy of Jewish history continually repeats itself:

"By the light of burning heretics Christ's bleeding feet I track, Toiling up new Calvaries ever with the cross that turns not back,
And these mounts of anguish number how each generation learned
One new word of that grand credo that in prophet hearts hath burned."

Still, as of old, it is ignorance that lights up the path of truth with burning hereties, it is ignorance that resists the Spirit uttering His credo through prophet-hearts, it is ignorance that sets the battle in array between "old systems" and "the Word." The real tragedy is not in the fact that the light-bringer is misunderstood and made to suffer. He expects to suffer, "for suffering is the badge of all his tribe"—the real tragedy is the spoiling of the future for the people we love, the destroying of their chance, the flinging away of their precious jewel. "In ignorance ye did it"—says the apostle. Yes, in ignorance it was done, to save a pet system of tradition, but it blighted the hopes of the nation forever. We are suffering woefully now from the ignorance, which in the past turned away spiritual leaders from our Society, in order to guard the "peculiar forms" which had grown sacred through custom. We are weak when we should be strong, because in ignorance we have looked down when the Voice said, "Look up;" because we have said, "Stand still," when the Spirit said, "Go forward."

Remember the fate of poor Ignorance in "Pilgrim's Progress"—he reached the very gate of the celestial city, yet angels carried him away to the bottomless pit.

GIPSY SMITH'S MESSAGE.

THE success attending the efforts of Gipsy Smith, the noted English evangelist, who is now in this country, and his unusual power with the more mature and intelligent classes, make his message of peculiar interest. We recently attended some of his meetings in Philadelphia, and will try to state briefly, some of the features which appealed to us. In the first place, his message is direct and simple. It has none of the conventional theological cant common with so many evangelists. Like the Master, his creed is his life, and his theology is implied rather than expressed. Religion has to do with experience, not definition. His questions are not what do you think, or what do you believe—but how are you living up to your ideals, how do you use your opportunities, how do you measure by what you believe to be God's standard for you?

Sin is the awful thing that keeps men from God, and sin is the object of his attack. He does not attempt to define it, but makes his appeal to the individual conscience. Every heart can, and must, discover for itself what keeps it from its best, and that thing, whatever it is, is sin, and must be put aside. We know and God knows what it is, and we know and He knows when it is forsaken, and then He can and does save. The things we must forsake are not always recognized as evil from without. Duty is not fulfilled by "shalt nots." Thou shalt not murder and thou shalt not steal, but thou shalt also give up seemingly good things if they stand in the way of our best. We can not find peace as long as we willfully live below our best. We must be willing to surrender all for Jesus. The cross must become a reality in our own experience.

Then, again, men long for a Saviour, not alone a saving power, but a person. The thing that counts most in human life is heart-throb responding to heart-throb. The evangelist illustrated this thought by telling a circumstance in his own life. He had been away from home for nine months, and when he returned his wife and little girl were delighted to see him. The joy of the child knew no bounds. She caressed him again and again, and prattled so much that others could scarcely talk. She wanted all his time and attention, but a neighbor chanced to call, and the evangelist, desiring to gain a little time for this visitor, put his hand into his pocket and took out some money. "Here, dear," he said, "take this and go over to the store and buy the thing you would like best." But the child faltered, the lips pouted and big tears began to roll down her cheeks. "No, papa, I don't want your old money, I want you." It was a rebuke and a lesson. "Love can find its fulfillment only in persons."

And here is the heart of the message. "Ye must be born again," and "from above." The soul is reaching upward and the heart can not be satisfied until it finds a new center. Its cry is answered on Calvary. The love of God that sent His Son into the world must be met by the love of man involving his best service. It is a realization of this function that brings us into fellowship with the Divine, and "in the atmosphere of this fellowship is victory"—victory over sin and self, and this is salvation.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

New England Yearly Meeting has suffered a heavy loss through the death of Alfred H. Jones, China, Me. He has for some years been limited in his activities through increasing feebleness, due to advancing age, but in the period of his strength he was a man of great usefulness. His greatest public service was rendered during the years of reconstruction in the South, where he was superintendent of the educational work of Friends' Freedmen's Association. He was a man of decided public spirit and took a prominent part in the affairs of the town.

The neighborhood for miles about his home will keep him in loving memory for the comfort he brought into homes into which death had entered. He was sent for to attend funerals throughout the town, and his messages at these times of sorrow have been a blessing to many hearts. He was for many years clerk of the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight of New England Yearly Meeting, and he was himself a very gifted minister. He lived a quiet, retired life on his farm, and, for that reason, his own monthly and quarterly meeting had almost exclusively the benefit of his ministry, and he gave his own home people the best he had to give. His long life was eminently one of helpfulness and blessing.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

A REMARKABLE CHAPTER IN QUAKER HISTORY.

BY JOHAN MARCUSSEN.

About sixty years ago there lived a man in the valley, Rôldal, in Norway, by the name of Knud. His father's name was also Knud; hence, his official name was Knud Knudsen. The name of the little village in which his home was, was Botnen. So the name by which he was known between man and man was Knud Botnen.

Knud was at that time quite a young man. He was married and had three children, two sons and one daughter. The parish in which he lived was beautifully situated near a lake, with high picturesque mountains in the background. The soil was poor and gave but scanty crops for hard and diligent toil. The inhabitants were poor. That is, they had to live in a very economical way. Their little crop of barley and oats was ground together, the flour was baked into big but very thin cakes. After harvest the women would be at that work for about a fortnight, and then they would have a sufficient supply for the whole year. Part of the flour was used almost daily for porridge. They would raise a scanty crop of potatoes; the cows and sheep would give milk, butter and meat; from the lake they would now and then get a few fish, and by this supply they would live just as happily as people in any part of the world.

Here was Knud Botnen's home. He was neither better nor worse off than the rest. If there was any difference, Knud was amongst the most contented. He had always enough, and a little to spare for those who needed it—just a happy man in his possession.

But then something strange began to work in his inner life. He did not know what it was. It seemed to him as if something was wanting. The people in Róldal were religious people and very strict in their doctrines, and Knud had always been amongst the most pious. He had never said much, but his few words always had weight. Now he said almost nothing. It seemed as if he lived a life by himself, of which nobody else knew anything. He was diligent in reading the Bible, but in that there was nothing strange; that was almost a universal habit in Róldal. Still, Knud's reading was different. It seemed as if something or somebody was teaching him during his quiet walking about, and this teaching was often different from the ordinary conception of truth, and when Knud was reading his Bible he found that the teaching, which was dimly breaking through within him, was also in the Bible. Sometimes Knud took that book and went out to his neighbors. He was that quiet that he would sit in a house for a length of time with his Bible under his arm, perfectly silent. In rising, he would simply point to the book, and, without saying a word, he would leave the house. Sometimes he would read a small portion and then leave.

The people did not know what to think of Knud. Most of them thought he was getting crazy; but then he was always kind and willing to help, and in his home he was the kindest husband and father. Whatever could be the matter with him? It was clear that it had something to do with religion, and perhaps the priest would be able to find it out. So one or two went to the priest and told him that their good neighbor, Knud Botnen, had become a little singular; that, although he was as good and kind as ever, or even better, there was something curious about him. It was of a religious character, for he sometimes would say what never before had been heard in Róldal. It was strange, for although he did not say a single word against anybody, it seemed as if he had a source of teaching altogether independent of the church and the priest, and, of course, that could not be right. The priest was very thankful to these men for telling him of such an unheard-of, erroneous conduct. He would surely take it in hand before long.

Knud's father was not fully satisfied with the conduct of his son, and his wife's father saw in his son-in-law a developing lunatic, a stain of shame amongst the peaceful inhabitants of Róldal—and in that his daughter and grandchildren should be entangled—that was awful. These two old men talked the matter over and came to the conclusion that it would be best if they could get Knud's wife and children to leave him. So, one day they both appeared at the house of Knud Botnen and laid the matter before him. Well, Knud was silent, as always. After a while he said they had better lay their concern before his wife. If she felt it better to leave him and follow them, he would not hinder her in doing so. But then his wife did not feel that way at all. She had the very best of husbands, and, although his way of thinking was a little different from what was usual, she felt that wherever he was she ought to be, and if his divergency from the usual mode of religion should bring him into trouble of any kind, it would be her duty to help him with anything she was able. Well, the two old men left Knud, his wife and children to struggle along as best they could.

Then came the priest. Of course, he was the shepherd of his flock, the father of his children. "And what is the matter with thee, my son, Knud? Is not the old Lutheran religion good and reliable any more? Hast thou found anything better?"

Knud was silent for a while. Then he tried to explain that he felt something working within himself. He did not know what it was or who it was, but sometimes he felt very much broken. Perhaps it was that he felt he was a sinner. Certainly he was not as good and kind and loving as he ought to be. But then again he felt that immeasurable love and goodness surrounded him everywhere, and he felt himself at times so filled that he found no words fit to explain it, and so he kept silent. When he read his Bible he found it in the most perfect harmony with what he felt in his own inner life. It had become quite a new book to him. The priest listened to him in amazement. Then he murmured: "A teaching within—a teaching direct to the soul—hm. But, man, thou art a Quaker; how in the world have these notions been brought into thy head?"

Knud could not tell. He had not been outside of Róldal, and the Bible was the only book he had read. As to the word, "Quaker," he had never heard it before. Perhaps it was the first time it ever sounded in Róldal.

It was very strange. The priest did not know how to handle this matter; but, surely, it was necessary it should be stopped as soon as possible. It might spread and bring the good, old church into danger. He explained the matter to the bishop, and he came. Knud Botnen was brought before the bishop, and after some time in silence, he gave about the same explanation to the bishop which he formerly had given to the priest. After having listened to all which Knud had to say, the bishop patted him on his shoulder and said: "Stick firmly to what thou hast got my son."

This spiritual influence which Knud had felt seemed now to begin its work in others, also. The first man who openly acknowledged the teaching within was Jon Rinden. He and Knud had for several years quiet meetings together, in order to listen to the voice teaching them within. Afterwards came Lars Botnen and a young woman, Knud's sister. Then a blind woman, Eli. And as truth worked its way others joined the little flock, amongst them two brothers, Jon and Ole Öine, and Eli's brother, Mons.

As to the mystic word, "Quaker," which the priest had thrown out, it did not trouble them at all. Most likely it never afterwards entered their thoughts and was forgotten. In Stavanger and neighborhood there had been a small meeting of Friends ever since the beginning of the nineteenth century, but they knew nothing of the spiritual movement in Róldal, and the people in Róldal knew nothing of the Friends in Stavanger.

While this was going on in Norway there was a man in America, Lindley Murray Hoag, who felt a strange drawing toward Norway. Several times he saw in dreams a lake and houses near it; the lake, houses and meadows being surrounded by high mountains, forming altogether a most splendid scenery; and it seemed to him that he was eating fishes caught in that lake. In him was worked out a concern for a visit in the love of the Gospel to Norway.

In the year 1853, Lindley Murray Hoag came by way of London to Stavanger, Norway, and laid his concern before the Friends there. Norwegian Friends received him most kindly, and several of them, among whom was the able interpreter, Endre Dahl, went with him to all places where Friends were found, and much blessing followed their labors. As they traveled along, Lindley Murray Hoag was looking for that valley and lake, which he so plainly had seen in his dreams when in America, but, although he saw many mountains and many lakes, he did not see anything like that which he saw in his dreams.

One day Endre Dahl told him that they had now been to all the Friends that he knew of. Lindley Murray Hoag became uneasy, and, after a time of quietness, said that he had not yet been to the place which formed the real concern for his journey. A map of Norway was placed before him, but that did not give him any help. He became more uneasy and walked from one end of the room to the other for some time. All at a sudden he stopped and turned toward the mountains in the east. Pointing in that direction, he said: "There, over there, is the place where I must go." They had already been to all places in that direction where Friends were located; but Endre Dahl and some other Friends readily consented to go with him once more.

A place called Svde was chosen as the first stopping place. There was a meeting-house, and a meeting was appointed. A man by the name of Bjarne Aaby heard of it. He knew the people in Rldal, and felt that he ought to go and tell them of the meeting. It was haying time. When Bjarne Aaby came to Rldal he found the people out haying. He told them his errand, and said "There is a man from America and some people from Stavanger going to have a meeting at Svde to-night. They are all Quakers."

Quakers! This was, most likely, only the second time this strange word was heard in Rldal. The people made haste and went to Svde. When they came to the meeting, Lindley Murray Hoag was preaching, Endre Dahl interpreting. The Rldal people listened with amazement. Was this a new revelation? Did the message come from another world? What had dimly worked for years in the depths of their souls was here put before them in plain language.

The meeting ended. Lindley Murray Hoag wanted to go with the Rldal people, but the road was too difficult for him, over the high mountains. Another road was recommended, longer, but easier. By this Lindley Murray Hoag and the Stavanger people went the next day. As they passed a low chain of mountains, the Rldal valley, with the Rldal vatn, the small villages and the high mountains in the background, lay spread before them in the most brilliant illumination. Lindley Murray Hoag stood for a while like a marble statue. Then he exclaimed: "Oh! this is what I saw in my dreams in America."

Some time before this the people in Rldal had had some difficulty about a marriage. They did not feel it right to enter into marriage before the priest. They thought that their own agreement before the Lord was just as valid as if they had gone through a ceremony of the church, and two young people had acted accordingly. But after a while they became uneasy about it. Knud took the matter in hand. He sat for a long time alone, and in perfect silence. When he spoke about it he explained that he saw dark clouds before him. After a while he saw rays of light coming right from heaven, breaking through the dark clouds and shining on the spot where he sat. When he again spoke to others he said that, about the marriage they ought to be perfectly easy. It would come right in due course of time. When Lindley Murray Hoag came they were married after the manner of Friends.

The tithes to the priest caused these people much trouble. They found that the established church, in its teachings and arrangements, was so different from what they read in the Bible about the early church that they found it incorrect to sustain that church and its servants; hence, they could not conscientiously pay the tithes. According to the law, the priest had a right to his tithes, and when the people did not pay it he had a right to distrain, and he did use his right. This was felt very much by the people in a place where the soil gave but scanty return for hard labor.

Knud had one year bought and brought home timber and lumber for a new house. The time came when his tithes had to be paid. The priest took all his timber and lumber, and Knud lost what he, with much labor and through self-denial, had gathered.

After the visit of Lindley Murray Hoag, the people in Rldal became connected with the Society of Friends in Stavanger; a meeting-house was built, which was also used as a school-house, and one of the Friends, Mons Winje, acted as teacher.

Through much tribulation, Friends plodded along for several years, and quite a number were added to the church. But it was so hard. Hard work to get the necessities of life, and this made still harder because of the strict laws about the tithes.

News came to Rldal about a country where people were free to act in accordance with true righteousness and to serve God in true love; but that country was far away. However, they talked the matter over, and undoubtedly tried it in prayer before the Lord. Friends were truly united together, and in 1869 nearly 50 persons left Stavanger in a sailing-vessel bound for Quebec, Canada, and one day all these people came to Legrand, Marshall County, Iowa. Never before had so many strangers been seen at this small station.

Land was cheap, and every one of these Norwegians was successful in temporal matters. An old school-house was used as a meeting-house for several years. Later on a meeting-house and a school-house were built between Legrand and Dunbar, and were called "Stavanger."

Of their further life and spiritual welfare, I had better not give any account. It would only be my personal impressions. They might be partly correct, but would be in danger of onesidedness. One thing I feel I must add—I have been told that when Knud was an old man he would sometimes rise in the gallery of the meeting-house and say with much emphasis: "We will have to get back to our old landmarks." Did that old man feel that, as they prospered temporally, they were in danger of growing cold and indifferent to the teaching of the Spirit, the light within?

It has been a great joy to me to gather these facts. I think I will remember as long as I live the emotion and the tears in the eyes of those old men as they told me of their experience many years ago, when they first were gathered into the church of Christ. May the blessing of the Lord go with them and their children after them.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

"A LITTLE WHILE."

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

In our Lord's last conversation with His disciples before His betrayal and crucifixion, He said to them: "A little while, and ye shall not see Me; and again a little while, and ye shall see Me, because I go unto the Father." Those sweet, tender words, "a little while," have deep thoughts in them—like the still ocean at the twilight, thoughts too deep for our fathoming. They breathe some precious consolation to those whose burdens are heavy, either of care, or poverty, or sickness. If the prosperous can enjoy their prosperity only for a little while, neither shall the mourner weep much longer, nor God's poor children carry much longer the pains or privations of poverty. The daily toil to earn the daily bread, the carking care to keep the barrel from running low, and the scanty "cruise" from wasting, will soon be over.

Cheer up, my brother! "In a little while ye shall see Me," says your blessed Master, "for I go to prepare a place for you." Oh, the infinite sweep of the glorious transition! A few years here in a lowly dwelling whose rent it was hard to pay, and then infinite ages in the palace of the King of kings. Here a scanty table and coarse raiment soon outworn; yonder a robe of resplendent light at the marriage supper of the Lamb. Let this thought put new courage into thy soul and fresh sunshine into thy countenance.

I sometimes go into a sick chamber where the "prisoners of Jesus Christ" are suffering, with no prospect of recovery. Perhaps the eyes of some of those chronic invalids may fall upon this article. My dear friends, put under your pillows these sweet words of Jesus—"a little while." It is only for a little while that you are to serve your Master by patient submission to His holy will. That chronic suffering will soon be over. That disease which no earthly physician can cure will soon be cured by the Divine Physician, who, by the touch of His messenger, will cure you, in an instant, into the perfect health of heaven! You will exchange this weary bed of pain for that crystal air in which none shall say, "I am sick"; neither shall there be any more pain.

Not only, however, to the sick and to the poverty-stricken child of God do these tender words of our Redeemer bring solace. Let these words, "a little while," bring a healing balm to the hearts that are smarting under unkindness, or wounded by neglect, or pining under privations, or bleeding under sharp bereavements. I offer them as a sedative to sorrows and a solace under sharp afflictions. "A little while, and ye shall see Me"; and the sight of Him shall in an instant wipe out all the memories of the darkest hours through which you made your way into the everlasting rest.

A few more struggles here,
A few more conflicts o'er;
A little while of toils and tears;
And we shall weep no more.

These words of the Master are also a trumpet call to duty. In a little while my post in the pulpit will be empty; what manner of minister ought I to be in fidelity to dying souls? Sabbath-school teacher, in a little while you shall meet the children of your class for the last time! Are you winning them to Christ? The time is short. Whatever your hands find to do for the Master, do it. Do it, Aquila and Priscilla, in the Sunday-school! Do it, Lydia, in the home! Do it, Dorcas, with thy needle; and Mary, in the room of sickness and sorrow! Do it, Tertius, with thy pen; and Apollos, with thy tongue! Do it, praying Hannah, with thy children, and make for them the "little coat" of Christian character, which they shall wear when you have gone home to a mother's heavenly reward!

Only think, too, how much may be achieved in a little while! The atonement for a world of perishing sinners was accomplished between the sixth hour and the ninth hour on darkened Calvary. That flash of divine electricity from the Holy Spirit, which struck Saul of Tarsus to the ground, was the work of an instant, but the great electric burner of the converted Paul has blazed over all the world for centuries. A half-hour's faithful preaching of Jesus by a faithful Methodist exhorter brought the boy Spurgeon to a decision, and launched the mightiest ministry of modern times. Every Christian can testify that the best decisions and deeds of his or her life turned on the pivot of a few minutes. We ought to be misers of our minutes! If on a dying bed they are so precious, why not in the fuller days of our healthful energies?

Our whole eternity will hinge on the "little while" of probation here. As a convert exclaimed in a prayer meeting: "It was only a moment's work when I was in earnest." May God help us all to be faithful for a little while; and then comes the unfading crown.

A little while for patient vigil keeping,
To face the stern, to wrestle with the strong;
A little while to sow the seed with weeping,
Then bind the sheaves and sing the harvest song.

A little while to keep the oil from failing,
A little while faith's flickering lamp to trim,
And then, the Bridegroom's coming footsteps hailing,
We'll haste to meet Him with the bridal hymn.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

ADJURATION.

BY HARRY R. HOLE.

A study of the trial of Christ raises a question of especial interest to Friends, in view of their literal interpretation and universal application of His command, "Swear not at all," because those who contend for Christian oaths rest their position largely upon the view that Jesus Himself took the judicial oath.

Adjuration, to which Caiaphas resorted in trying Christ (Matt. 26:63), is defined by good authority as "a solemn act or appeal, whereby one man, usually a person vested with natural or official authority, imposes upon another the obligation of speaking or acting as if under the solemnity of an oath." This obligation was imposed upon one without one's consent, so that, when connected with a question, the only choice lay between a truthful answer and disobedience to the divine and Mosaic law.

A study of the Law in its reference to adjuration, and of examples from Old Testament history, showing its workings, will help us to a more perfect understanding of the subject. He who swears curses himself, in case of unfaithfulness; he who adjured cursed the other, in case of non-compliance: and this curse assumed divine authority if the injunction was not obeyed. This is seen by Lev. 5:1, more clearly rendered by the Revised Version, "And if any one sin, in that he heareth the voice of adjuration, he being a witness, whether he hath seen or known, if he do not utter it, then he shall hear his iniquity."

Not only was adjuration employed in extracting the truth, but in causing certain things to be done or left undone. Thus, Joshua (6:26) uttered an injunction against the rebuilding of Jericho, and his curse was fulfilled upon the man who dared disregard it (I Kings 16:34). Saul rashly charged his men not to eat, and thereby brought on serious trouble (I Sam. 14:24-30, 36-42).

When Micah's mother uttered in his hearing an adjuration, or curse, concerning some missing property, even he who had made bold to steal her 1,100 pieces of silver feared longer to conceal his crime (Judges 17:1, 2). When Ahab called on Micaiah, the prophet of God, he first received a favorable reply, which he knew to be mockery. But when he said, "How many times shall I adjure thee that thou speak unto me nothing but the truth in the name of Jehovah?" Micaiah made no delay in delivering the true message (I Kings 22:15-17). Solomon refers to this law when he says, "Whoso is partner with a thief hateth his own soul; he heareth the adjuration and uttereth nothing" (Prov. 29:24).

Thus, we see that Caiaphas took advantage of the law of Moses to break Christ's silence and compel a statement of His claims. In order to show that he did not in any sense administer an oath, the following is taken from Gurney's Observations:

"When an ancient Jew was examined in a court of justice, he swore to the fact to which he might be deposing in the following or some equivalent terms: 'Behold, I swear by the name of the Lord God of Israel, that such or such is the truth;' or otherwise he was put upon his oath or sworn by the judges, who said, 'We make thee swear by the Lord God of Israel that such or such is the truth,' to which adjuration the deponent was accustomed to reply, 'Amen.'"

Jesus was in court, not as a witness, but under accusation. The High Priest was not seeking to determine whether or not Jesus was the Son of God, but whether or not He claimed to be the Christ. The question to be settled by witnesses had reference to past claims. The evidence being unsatisfactory, the High Priest, in order to ensnare Him into a repetition of His alleged crime, solemnly enjoined Him to declare whether or not he was the Messiah. The examination of witnesses had been abandoned, and it is readily seen that this action was not in any sense calculated to elicit testimony; at least, not such testimony as courts of justice are concerned with. And since the claim of deity was fully sufficient to establish the charge of blasphemy, therefore an oath would be nowise superior to a simple statement.

Coupling these facts with the utter dissimilarity between the adjuration uttered by Caiaphas and the oaths quoted above, the conclusion appears unavoidable, that the command in its most literal interpretation is upheld, not only by the soundest principles of morality, but by the example of Him who spoke it.

In imagining what is holy and divine, we take flight to other worlds and conceive that there the film must fall away, and all adorable realities burst upon the sight. Alas! what reason have we to think any other station in the universe more sanctifying than our own? The dimness we deplore no traveling would cure; we carry our darkness with us. Those to whom the earth is not consecrated will find their heaven profane.—Martineau.

"The man who thinks he is deceiving God and the people as to his Christian experience is himself the one most deceived."

BETTER THAN IS NECESSARY.

A certain business firm has upon its seal the motto: "A little better than is necessary." It is the secret of success in every business of life, from the first lesson to the last. Take it in school, for instance. One pupil may prepare his lesson perfectly, as far as limits of the text require; another, studying with broader purpose, does not stop with the limits of the appointed lesson, but seeks everywhere for deeper knowledge of the subject itself. Is there any question which work will rank higher in the end?

A young clerk in a store may be accurate, faithful, honest, and industrious—and stay there; another clerk may add to these necessary qualifications for his work a personal interest in his customers which makes him remember their peculiar likes and dislikes and makes his serving them seem almost a matter of personal friendliness. Is there any question which will win the better trade?

A young girl at home may set the table and dust the rooms perfunctorily as a duty to be done faithfully, of course, but dismissed as soon as possible, or she may add a score of dainty touches to her work that will make it a pleasure to herself and a joy to others. "A little better than is necessary"—it makes the difference between a slave or an artist; for, after all, it is in the spirit that the secret lies. To the high soul the "necessary" is always the very best way that it can give.—The Word and the Way.

HE WAS NOT AT HOME.

The extreme distaste of the modest Quaker poet, John Greenleaf Whittier, for foolish hero-worship, and the skill which he attained in politely eluding too enthusiastic admirers, have been exemplified in many anecdotes. Even now, however, new ones occasionally come to light. One such recently related tells how two women, of the type at once sentimentally gushing and over-confident of their own importance, visited Amesbury to seek the poet in his home.

They went astray in their search for his house, and bustled into a small general store to be re-directed. The clerk, smiling a little queerly, informed them that the Whittier house was near by—but a few steps 'round the corner.

One of the women, a big, florid, overdressed being, with languishing eyes, caught the smile, and clasped her hands with a rapt air.

"Oh, don't you think he'll see us?" she demanded. "He simply must! We've heard he doesn't like to, but he must; we won't go away till he does. We've thought up ever so many things we want to ask him."

The clerk, still smiling, glanced casually toward a quiet man in a shadowy corner, sitting on a barrel, surrounded by a group of other leisurely customers. They had all been talking politics together, village-fashion, when the strangers came in.

"Think he will?" said the clerk.

"Well," replied the man on the barrel, hesitatingly, "thee knows Greenleaf does not find it easy to refuse a lady. I think, perhaps, he will—if he is at home."

The women bustled away again, excited and expectant, and a chuckle went round among the laughing men. The man on the barrel, with a trace of apology in his tones, rose from his perch to go.

"They will not waste five minutes," he murmured, "it is such a little way. Besides, thee knows very well that exercise is a good thing for stout ladies."

"That's so, Mr. Whittier," assented the clerk.

JOSEPH FAITHFUL IN PRISON.

Genesis 39: 20; 40: 15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. Rev. 2: 10.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fourth mo. 22.—Joseph faithful in prison. Gen. 39: 20; 40: 4.

Third-day, Fourth mo. 23.—Joseph faithful in prison. Gen. 40: 5-23.

Fourth-day, Fourth mo. 24.—Prayer in affliction. Psalm 43.

Fifth-day, Fourth mo. 25.—Trust in God. Psalm 118: 5-17.

Sixth-day, Fourth mo. 26.—A good conscience. I Pet. 3: 8-17.

Seventh-day, Fourth mo. 27.—Fear not. Matt. 10: 21-33.

First-day, Fourth mo. 28.—Rest and wait. Psa. 37: 7-17.

Time.—Uncertain; perhaps about 1750 B. C.

Place.—The city in which Potiphar lived has not been identified. Some think it was Heliopolis; others, Toan or Tanis, near the land of Goshen. This latter is the more probable. The former was about six miles from modern Cairo; the latter, not far from one of the mouths of the Nile.

Persons.—Joseph, about twenty-two years old when put over Potiphar's house, and twenty-seven when cast into prison. Potiphar, an officer, or captain of the guard of Pharaoh's court.

Monarch.—A Pharaoh of the third Hyksos dynasty or "Shepherd Kings." These were foreigners, who had overrun Egypt and held sway for about five hundred and fifty years.

The story in chapter 39 goes on from chapter 37: 36, chapter 38 being a parenthesis. Joseph, by his good conduct and ability, is rapidly promoted until he becomes the chief man in Potiphar's household. Potiphar's wife tempts him to commit sin, and, on his refusal, because (1) it would be a breach of trust, and (2) because it would be a "sin against God," becomes his enemy, and on her false accusation he is thrown into prison. All through Joseph's life in Egypt we are told that, "The Lord was with him." In consequence of this fact, he was sustained at all times.

20. "Took him and put him into prison." Literally, "round house." From what follows, it would seem to have been a place for the confinement of the better class of prisoners.

21. The Lord was with Joseph here, as He had been elsewhere. "Keeper of the prison." An inferior officer under Potiphar (see 40: 3). His name is not given.

22, 23. Joseph is made the overseer of the prison, and everything is entrusted to his care. "The Lord was with him" [Joseph].

1. "Butler." The chief butler (see verse 2). The word hardly conveys the true idea. He was rather the "cup-bearer," an officer of importance, because he came into very close personal contact with the monarch. Compare Nehemiah. Neh. 1:11.

2. "Wroth." Why, is not told. A tradition says the two had conspired to poison the monarch.

4. "Charged Joseph with them." Appointed him to be their attendant. "A season." For some time. This gave the opportunity for them to become well acquainted with Joseph.

6, 7. The ancients, and particularly the Egyptians, attached great importance to dreams. These men, under the circumstances, were greatly affected and showed it in their looks. Joseph, being of a sympathetic nature, saw their gloom and asked what caused it.

8. They felt that much was implied if only someone could be found to interpret. Joseph says Divine power is needed to interpret. Compare 41:16, 38, 39; Dan. 2:19, 28. In Egypt, as in Babylon, there were professional interpreters of dreams, but, of course, in prison they could not be reached.

9-11. The dream is graphically related. Inscriptions have been found in Egypt fully in accord with the descriptions in the text. Objection has been made to the story on the ground that unfermented wine was not in common use; but this proves nothing, for it may have been used on special occasions, and in a king's household is just where exceptions might be looked for. "In a text, found in Egypt, it is said that grapes squeezed into water formed a refreshing beverage, which was drunk by the king."

12. "This is the interpretation." Joseph at once interprets the dream, with confidence.

13. "Shall Pharaoh lift up thine head." Restore thee to the condition of a freeman. Compare II Kings 25:27, where, under similar conditions, the same phrase is used. "Thy place." Thy office R. V. He will be restored to his former office of cup-bearer.

14. "But have me in thy remembrance." R. V. Joseph had given him assurance that what the butler most wished—his freedom and restoration—should take place, and he naturally asked the butler to use his influence on his behalf. Note the modesty of his appeal. "Out of this house." Not simply out of prison, which was bad enough, but out of this condition of slavery, in which I am forced to act as jailer.

15. "I was stolen away." He was not justly a slave—he had not been born in slavery, nor been taken captive in war, nor committed crime. The butler forgot all about him for two years (41:1), when the dreams of Pharaoh suggested the Hebrew captive slave. The dream of the chief baker, also interpreted by Joseph, comes true.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Sweet are the uses of adversity."
2. "Noble souls, through dust and heat,
Rise from disaster and defeat
The stronger."
3. Joseph suffered keenly. Psalm 105:17-23.
4. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much.")'

FOREIGN MISSIONS: CHRIST IN THE CONTINENT OF ASIA.

The continent that cradled the ancestry of our Lord, and in a little corner of which He lived His earthly life, is to-day one great hive of peoples, but few of whom yet know Him. From Syria to China, and from India to Siberia, stretch the vast domains, many parts of which are among the most densely populated regions of the world, and it is only here and there among them that Christ is known and honored.

"Beginning at Jerusalem," the disciples commenced the work that falls to us to-day. Tradition has it that the Apostle Thomas carried Christianity to India; and while this is probably false, believers were found in that land before the close of the second century. Yet, to-day, of its nearly 300,000,000 souls, not more than one per cent. are classed as Christians. Active efforts at evangelization date from the labors of two German missionaries, sent out by the King of Denmark in 1706. "Between 1851 and 1890, the number of mission stations increased three-fold, while the number of native Protestant Christians has multiplied more than five-fold, the number of communicants nearly fifteen-fold, and the number of churches or congregations sixteen-fold. This was largely due to the extended employment of native agency in the work. The native ordained pastors increased from 21, in 1851, to 797, in 1890, and the native lay preachers from 493 to 3,491."

Passing to the extreme north, we find Siberia with its boundless and sparsely settled steppes, from which Christianity is all but excluded by the prohibition of missionary propaganda, except that of the Russian Church. The heathen and Mohammedan inhabitants are therefore shut off from the Gospel, except as it comes to them through this Church, so that their needs are but scantily met.

China began to hear of Christ in the sixth century, and at times the Catholic missionaries were received with great favor, though they lost much of their influence in the eighteenth century. Protestant missions date from 1807, and while the work has seemed to progress slowly, medical and educational work have done much to open the way; while the administration of famine relief and the heroic martyrdom of believers in the sufferings and disturbances of the past few years in that land have gone far toward developing a favorable attitude toward the Gospel that teaches such things.

FOREIGN MISSIONS*

It might be expected that before this body, writers and speakers in sympathy with foreign missions would make it the chief point to press the claims of this branch of Christ's service, and the obligations of the church to obey our Lord's last great command to His disciples before His ascension, "Go, ye, into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." But I shall take it for granted that we who are here assembled all, as thoughtful readers of Christ's words, acknowledge this obligation, and I will only offer some thoughts on time, place, method, and means for this service.

As to time—The disciples who heard Jesus speak understood Him to mean now, and they, having waited as He directed for the "endowment of power from on high," which was not long delayed, forthwith went abroad, far and near, preaching, as He had commanded them. Guided by their example, with His command still ringing in the ears of the church, many believe His time is still now, and will be till all the world has heard the message of life. Others plead the needs and claims of the people at home. There is enough to do at home at present, they say. But, in practice, home and foreign missions are not found to antagonize each other.

Protestantism has been slow to act in the case. It is only about one hundred years since permanent work in the foreign mission field was first undertaken under its auspices, and then in a very small way; but the conviction that Christ waits for this service from His church is now found in most denominations, and they are generally represented in the foreign field. How long shall it take them to carry out the great command? Have the slow centuries since He spoke it worked His will. Think of the millions that have lived and died since then without hearing the Gospel! But many now are aroused and enthusiastic. They feel that the church should hasten to do His bidding, and not allow another century to close without the Gospel having been presented to all nations. Or in less time still, as in the motto of the great Student Volunteer Movement, "The world for Christ in this generation." These students have calculated, as they believe, the resources of Christendom and the extent of the field, and they say, "We are able." Can we, the Friends, place ourselves in line with this active, ardent life?—believe that a great epoch a great crisis, is upon us and measure up to its demands, glad that we live in this day? This earth is not very large, nor its nations innumerable. Perhaps one hundred years from now there will be no place for foreign missions, no nation that has not heard the Gospel. Who shall have the joy and the glory of being the actors of this great epoch which is to close the work of foreign missions? It cannot be accomplished without effort and sacrifice. The service demands the brightest and best-beloved out of our homes, and money from our—as we may think—scanty stores to support the work; and it must be upheld by the sympathy and prayers of those at home, if it is speedily done, but angels might crave our opportunity. Shall we neglect it because the service is costly?

In this prevision of the finishing up of foreign missions it is not set forth that all men will be so speedily brought into submission to Christ, but only that in every nation His Gospel shall have been preached, with living churches planted in every country, intent that all their people may hear. The Evangel preached thereafter will be for home missions the world over. The heathen we now teach will be teaching their own people, not depending on foreign aid. For this work of home missions no end is set this side of the millenium. Preaching the Gospel at home, instructing the ignorant, caring for the needy and afflicted, lifting the fallen, and reforming as well as restraining the depraved, will continually be the great work of the church till Christ comes, and opportunity to help in this lies, and will lie, at the door of all the generations. Christ said, "The poor ye have always with you." But these at home have a chance to hear; shall those who never had this chance wait for all these to be persuaded? In no Christian land, however old, are all the people Christians.

As to the place where we should work—The field is the world. Christ died for all men. Where there is a clear call to go there is the place. But, without such definite leading, economy of means suggests the nearer of the needy fields. Time and money are saved for service by going to those who are near. Should Americans seek the farthest shores of Asia and Africa and Christian Europe plant the missions of the Americas? This would give to transportation companies an undue share of the gifts for missions. Because of the rapidly increasing number of missionaries that are seeking unevangelized lands, the principles of the missionary comity in dividing up the territory must be more and more rigidly observed, that the work be not hindered by interferences. Thoughtful missionaries more and more deplore and disregard division lines among Protestant Christians, divisions that converts from the heathen do not easily comprehend, if, in fact, we do very fully ourselves. Surely, to the heathen, Christ should not be divided. Do we hear our Saviour praying, "That they all may be one, Father, as we are one?"

* A paper read before a Meeting of Ministry and Oversight in Richmond, Ind., by Mohalah Jay.

As to methods—There is room in this work for large variety. The medical missionary gains access to the largest number of natives. Jesus commanded His disciples when He sent them forth, "Heal the sick." Schools give slower but more lasting results, the press sends the Gospel to many whom the missionary never sees. The preached word is the immediate means of holding up Christ to all that will hear. All these methods are often successfully combined in one work. Another method is coming into large favor, the industrial. It is harder for people to be virtuous in idleness and poverty than when properly employed and receiving returns for their labor. For this reason the industries should be taught. Heathen nations are essentially poor. They cannot support their schools and churches when such are established, nor meet the new wants that arise under the new conditions, by their old methods of life. Hence, industrial missions are coming to the front. Teach the natives how to produce and to market the products of their several countries, and it is a long step toward self-support of their Christian institutions, as schools, churches, etc., which must be insisted upon if they are ever to be independent Christian nations. These problems of method need careful study. For example, let us look at California Yearly Meeting's mission among the Eskimos of the Arctic regions—one of the most successful of American Friends' missions. They have furnished a store-house with goods needed there, and their missionaries have been men knowing enough of business to handle these profitably and teach others to handle them, and while training others in business they have done much to support the work of the mission. The Government has entrusted to these missionaries herds of reindeer, and they have had Eskimo men trained to take care of them, these receiving as their wages, in part, some reindeer to start herds of their own; in all this management, business principles and Christian principles have been taught together. In the ten years of that mission's existence the Eskimos, to the number of 1,100, have accepted the Christian teaching, and are enrolled in the church, though they still dress in baggy furs, live in ice huts, and hunt seals in their frail boats for a living. It is hard for Europeans and Americans to distinguish fully between Christianity and our civilization; to think, for instance, a row of blanket Indians squatted on the ground as truly Christians, if they have accepted Christ, as the same men and women would be clothed in American costume and seated on chairs in a meeting-house. And is not our pity greatly excited sometimes by hearing of the scantily-clad, or unclothed Africans, although, from the climate in which they live and their habits of life, they are more comfortable thus and healthier than if clothed in the white man's dress? So of many Asiatic customs. It is not the mission of the ambassador of Christ to change these things when they are not harmful. Better, as is done by the missionaries of the China Island Mission, and by some others, adopt the dress and other social customs of the country, where nothing truly Christian is compromised thereby. Christ did not wear the American gentleman's style of clothes. Can you picture Him in the narrow American pantaloons, tall, stiff hat, and high-heeled boots?—and did he talk in English?

As to money to carry the Gospel to foreign lands—We have said that the work is costly, but "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof." If Christians would recognize the Bible teaching that they are stewards, not owners, of the possessions under their control, the Lord's treasury would be amply supplied.

As to missionaries—The Lord will provide. He has them in store if they be not held back by want of full consecration somewhere. Does it seem hard to lay all that we have, our possession, our prospects, our hopes and our affections at our Lord and Master's feet? But love keeps back nothing for self. There is high and holy example of surrender and sacrifice set before us—"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" for it—for us. Encouragement is given—"When He putteth forth His sheep He goeth before them;" and a sustaining promise is left us—"Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Missionary boards and conferences can only work out methods for efficiency and economy, but these methods are only methods. They cannot supply the place of the enduring purpose required in this work, nor relieve it from essential elements of sacrifice and self-surrender.

F. A. I. M. JOURNAL NOTES.

Twelfth month, 1906.

Twelfth month, 8th. To-day, an enormous and boisterous funeral crowd was gathered not far distant. The usual dancing, and what appears to be fighting unseen spirits of the air with weapons of heathen warfare, was being indulged. At the word of the chief this stopped, and a large number sat down for a short Gospel service.

Twelfth month, 14th. Returned this evening from Kaimosi, where we held the combined annual meeting and regular monthly meeting of the Field Committee.

The most gratifying feature of the meeting was the examination of five candidates for recognition as native Christians. All appear to have experienced the new birth, and we rejoice as we record these, whom we believe have already been recorded in heaven.

Twelfth month, 19th. Our station seems to be in the habitual path of noon-day whirlwinds. Only two of our 11 thatch buildings have been fortunate enough to miss the line of march of these various rotaries, several having taken off their straw hats a number of times in the presence of a superior power. To-day's visitation whirled two galvanized iron wash tubs several feet into the air, and made unusual scatterment in its line of travel.

Twelfth month, 25th. The merriest Christmas yet spent in Africa. A number of parcels from the home-land came just in time to be of service. Branches from a red-blossomed bush made quite a festive Christmas tree for the little ones. While decorating the chapel with similar branches, a local chief came along and watched in silence for a time, then said: "What custom is this?" We were glad to explain, as best we could, that it was in honor of our Saviour and theirs.

Twelfth month, 28th. Our Gospel service was cut short to-day by the alarm of "fire!" Our thatched cook-house roof was ablaze, and by the time we reached the spot the heat was too intense to save nearly all its contents from the fire.

Twelfth month, 31st. Surely, "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." I was called at gray dawn this morning to a hut, just off our station, where a sub-chief had been almost killed by a malicious subject. A man in a pool of blood, with head cut open and bleeding profusely, surrounded by a number of natives wailing distractedly, was not an agreeable sight. It seemed almost impossible to stanch the flow of blood, and he appeared to be dying, but we finally succeeded, and at the end of two hours he was in a more hopeful condition. A party of Kivini's men, in searching for the would-be murderer, were repulsed by sympathizers and several slightly wounded by spears and arrows.

Would that the dying year could end all such deeds and strife, and the new year usher in the reign of righteousness.

There was somebody who found nothing but fault with everything in the belongings of her friend. Was it you?

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

John H. Newlin is critically ill from a paralytic stroke at his home in Marshall, Ind.

Dr. Woodard had charge of the Easter service in Knightstown, Ind., Meeting.

Nathan Frame, Richmond, was acceptably with Friends at Spiceland, Ind., on the 8th inst.

On the 24th ult., Joseph Williams had acceptable service with Friends at Knightstown, Ind.

Francis W. Thomas and wife had good service with Friends at Raysville, Ind., the 31st ult.

Friends in South Wabash, Ind., are making arrangements to dedicate their new meeting-house the 21st inst.

Fred. L. Ryon recently gave a lecture, "The American Indian," before the Political Equality Club, Sherwood, N. Y. It was much appreciated.

Poplar Ridge Meeting is soon to lose two valuable members: John and Lydia H. King. They have sold their home and expect to remove to Webster City, Iowa. They will be greatly missed.

Samuel A. Jackson and family have moved to Alva, Okla., where he begins pastoral work. This leaves Buffalo, Kan., Meeting without a pastor. Friends there hope to secure some one as soon as possible.

At Farmington Quarterly Meeting, held at Farmington, N. Y., the 2d, 3d and 4th inst., Walter J. Aldrich was very acceptably in attendance. William Carleton Wood was acknowledged a minister of the Gospel.

Wilmington College has enjoyed a successful year. Her attendance is the largest in her history. The gain in the college department has been beyond expectation. The registration has grown from 56, last year, to 93, this year. The total registration in the college is 165.

Albert J. Brown, president of Wilmington College, and his companion, Thomas Scott, who has been doing pastoral work at Sabine, Ohio, are on their way to Woodbrooke. They sailed from New York the 13th inst. Together with Ralph Lewis, they called at THE AMERICAN FRIEND office the 11th.

The fourth annual meeting of the railroad employees of the city of Muncie, Ind., was held at the Friends' meeting-house, Third month 31st, which was marked with deeper interest than any meeting previous. The meeting was participated in by more of the railroad men than usual, and the attendance was larger. A beautiful Easter badge was given to each one present.

Edward and Myra Smith, recently from Portland, Ore., closed a series of meetings at El Modena, Cal., the 31st ult. The weather was rainy and disagreeable during the opening days of the meetings, and this, together with the sickness in the community, caused the meetings to be small at first. There were several renewals and conversions. The evangelists went to the seashore for a much needed rest after the meetings closed.

The revival services closed at Farmland, Ind., the last of Second month, resulting in 30 conversions and an uplift to the members of the meeting. Twenty-five new members have been taken into the meeting up to this time. The Bible-school is the largest it has ever been. A large Junior C. E. is doing good work, and gave an interesting program on Easter night. Wm. Angel very acceptably preached for Farmland Friends, in the absence of John Kittrell and wife, who are in North Carolina engaged in some special meetings.

John M. Watson writes from Friendsville, Tenn.: "I am now on a visit to the families and meetings of Friendsville, Tenn., Quarterly Meeting, also Eastern Quarterly in North Carolina, with some prison and other public institutions. As way opens, I greatly desire the prayers of my friends that I may have wisdom and strength for the work. May I say that I am greatly encouraged with the increased value of THE AMERICAN FRIEND on all lines. Letters sent to my address in Wilmington, Ohio, will reach me."

The new Friends' meeting-house, at Muncie, Ind., is progressing rapidly. Since the winter has been so mild, the workmen have been able to accomplish more than was expected. The cost of the new building will be $35,000 or $45,000. Thirty-one years ago a small meeting was opened, with six men, six women and six children. It was held first the Second-day of Fourth month, 1876, and the following First-day a Bible-school was started, which has been held regularly ever since, averaging from 150 to 200. Special exercises were held the 14th inst., celebrating the opening of the meeting.

Alexander M. Purdy, Farmington Meeting, N. Y. (post-office, Palmyra, N. Y.), who has been shut in by sickness and death in his family for years past, hopes to so arrange his affairs this fall so that he can attend meetings within the limits of Wilmington, Indiana, Western and Iowa, and perhaps Kansas, California and Oregon Yearly Meetings. He writes he has not lost interest in Friends, and especially his old associates, and that he has kept himself informed, as he has been "hid in the cleft of the rock." He hopes to attend the quarterly meeting held in Skaneateles, the last week of this month. His health is excellent.

The Wilmington College peace oratorical contest, under the auspices of the Intercollegiate International Arbitration and Peace Association, was held the 2d inst. There were six contestants. An excellent audience greeted the speakers and manifested a great deal of interest. First prize, amounting to $15 in cash, was awarded to Willis Crites, a member of the Sophomore Class; the second prize, amounting to $10, was awarded to Lindley I. Jones, a member of the Freshman Class; the third prize, amounting to $5, was awarded to Ruby Fisher, a member of the Junior Class. Four of the contestants are Friends and two are members of the Church of Christ.

At the last meeting of the Philadelphia Round Table it was decided to continue the study of Quaker History and Doctrine next year, probably in two sections, since there seems to be a need and a demand among young Friends for a course of study in Early Friends' History, as well as in the doctrine and problems. A committee was appointed to canvass the ground and report, also to nominate one or two new Executive Committees. The outlines for next year's study will be left to the new Executive Committees. All who feel an interest in visiting smaller meetings during the summer were asked to report to Emma Cadbury, Jr. Several young Friends feel a concern for this line of work, and doubtless will be quite active. The meeting directed that a minute be made to the effect that we favor any move toward the uniting of the various activities among Friends in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

A memorial service for Amos Sanders was held at the Friends' meeting in Brooklyn, N. Y., the 7th inst. Robert E. Pretlow, the pastor, gave a history of the life and work of the departed. John C. Pritchard spoke of his service in the ministry in Brooklyn Meeting. Anna Macomber sang as a solo, "Under His Wings." Chas. W. Lawrence, clerk, made an address on behalf of New York Monthly Meeting. Wm. C. Taber spoke of him as a pastor. Delia Rees told of the personal side of his work in the Middle West, and Viola B. Maurice gave a view of his home life. Arlando Marine read letters from Nettie C. Brown, clerk of Los Angeles Monthly Meeting, and Harry R. Keats, pastor at Pasadena, in regard to his work in California. Another letter from Clarence M. Case paid splendid personal tribute to the life and character of his friend. The exercises were closed by a solo, "Crossing the Bar." The service was largely attended by Friends of both Brooklyn and New York Meetings. The interment took place in the Friends' cemetery, Prospect Park, Brooklyn, N. Y., the 2d inst.

We have just received the following notes from Earlham College:

Work is progressing very rapidly on the Edwin S. Bundy Dormitory.

All members of the college community are glad to welcome Professor Hodgkin back to his work this term. He has been absent in California for his health during the winter.

The Christian Associations issued the last number of the Earlhamite, the college paper. We believe that this is a good way to remind people of the important place the Associations hold in college life.

We find that it adds to the strength of our Christian Associations to keep in touch with the work of other organizations of the kind in the State. The State Y. W. C. A. secretary visited us Fourth month 4th-7th. The president of the Y. M. C. A., William Elliott, attended the first conference of the presidents of the Y. M. C. A. student associations of Indiana, at Indianapolis, Third month 31st.

The college peace oratorical contest was held April 4th. There were three contestants, Lawrence Smelser, of the senior class, won first place, and will represent the college in Cincinnati next month.

The annual meeting of Friends' Social Union, comprising in its membership the larger part of the male members of Boston and Lynn Meetings, was held at the Boston meeting-house on the 8th inst. About 30 were present. A dinner was served at 6.30 P. M., during which the future of the Union was discussed, and after the meal each group reported its conclusions in the form of suggestions or resolutions, which were severally considered and acted upon. It was the unanimous decision to continue the organization, although some of the Friends had manifested little or no interest in it. It was also decided to hold six meetings during the coming year, instead of four, as in the past, and that two of them should be open to the women friends of the members, and known as "Ladies' Night." The annual election of officers took place, after which Frank J. Hammer, general agent at the Boston office of the Provident Life and Trust Co., gave an interesting talk on the "Recent Insurance Investigation," evincing, on the part of the speaker, a thorough knowledge of the principles of life insurance, and a careful observation of the circumstances that led up to the investigations. A general discussion followed. The Union will be pleased to open correspondence with other organizations, among Friends, of this or of a similar nature. Address the Vice-President, Geo. C. Herbert, 17 Chatham Street, Lynn, Mass.

Several important appointments have recently been made at Earlham College. Prof. William Coleman McNown, Cornell University, is to take charge of the Department of Civil Engineering, in place of Prof. R. L. Sackett, resigned. Prof. McNown has been for some time instructor of Railroad and Municipal Engineering at Cornell, and was previously engaged in practical work as engineer in the department of maintenance of way of the Erie Railroad. He is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin. Prof. Harry N. Holmes, Johns Hopkins, takes charge of the Department of Chemistry. Prof. Holmes is a teacher of five years' experience, and is to take his Ph.D. degree at Johns Hopkins in Sixth month. President Remsen, the leading chemist in the United States, gives him his "unqualified endorsement." Prof. Edwin Morrison, who has been acting Professor of Chemistry, will now devote his entire time to the work in Physics, which department has become very popular in his hands this year. Alfred T. Ware, who for some eighteen months has been serving as pastor in East Main Street Meeting, Richmond, has accepted the superintendency of Earlham, and will take charge during the summer. His wife will be matron. They succeed Wm. and Deborah Thomas, who, after five years' faithful and efficient service, return to their home, near Indianapolis. Prof. Elbert Russell has been employed as a lecturer on the Bible at Winona during the coming summer.

BOOK REVIEWS.

READINGS IN DESCRIPTIVE AND HISTORICAL SOCIOLOGY by Franklin H. Giddings, published by The MacMillan Co., New York, price, $2.00. Those who have followed Prof. Giddings in his former works, have found him persistent in the effort to harmonize the school of philosophers who are attempting to explain all phenomena from the psychic side and those who approach it entirely from the physical. His attempts do not seem to be altogether consistent, but they have been very useful in helping students discover grounds of common agreement. The present work is a brief re-statement of his idea of society, which may be called a physico-psychical organism. In his final analysis he seems to rank with the psychic school. He has gathered a great amount of data from trustworthy sources, which he has classified and arranged under several headings, illustrating his position. Whatever the final opinion be concerning Prof. Giddings' work, he deserves considerable credit for gathering so much useful material and placing it at the disposal of students in such a shape that it is readily accessible.

THE COMMON HERITAGE, by M. Catharine Albright, published by Headley Bros., London. This collection of essays opens with a pretty story of a boy playing in the fields near Nazareth, gazing upon the same scenes which surrounded Jesus; yet, when asked why travelers frequented the place, knew not the reason. The story is taken as a parable of life. The things about us are but commonplace, unless we have "eyes to see, ears to hear," and minds to understand; and when we do, even the least in life has a blessed significance.

FIND OUT

THE KIND OF FOOD THAT WILL KEEP YOU WELL.

The true way is to find out what is best to eat and drink, and then cultivate a taste for those things instead of poisoning ourselves with improper, indigestible food, etc.

A conservative Massachusetts woman writes:

"I have used Grape-Nuts five years for the young and for the aged; in sickness and in health; at first following directions carefully, later in a variety of ways as my taste and judgment suggested.

"But its most special, personal benefit has been a substitute for meat, and served dry with cream when rheumatic troubles made it important for me to give up the 'coffee habit.'

"Served in this way with the addition of a cup of hot water and a little fruit, it has been used at my morning meal for six months, during which time my health has much improved, nerves have grown steadier, and a gradual decrease in my excessive weight adds greatly to my comfort." Name given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

a place in the great symphony of time and space of which are a part. A halo enshrouds common things if we but knew it. They open out into the infinite if we but take the trouble to perceive. Heaven lies all about us, and its noiseless gates are ready to open if we will it. Such is the burden of the message of the book; and it cannot help making life sweeter for those who read it.

Some booklets from Headley Bros. Press, which deserve mention, are: THE CHILDREN'S MEETINGS, by M. E., is a short account of how little children kept meetings up while their parents were in prison at the time of the rise of the Quakers. ELIZABETH FRY, by Georgina King Lewis, the third number of "Friends, Ancient and Modern," fills a place in our society, where all is rush and hurry, by giving a synopsis of this useful life in 40 short pages. RED LETTER DAYS, a verse calendar, by William C. Braithwaite, is another pretty little booklet pleasing to read. And MANNER OF WORSHIP is a tract which should have a general circulation among Friends. It is a small four-leaf folder and contains a plea for silent worship, well put.

Friends desiring any of the above should write to the Friends' Book and Tract Committee, 51 Fifth Avenue, New York, who act as agents for Headley Bros., in this country.

HARVEY'S POEMS, by William P. Harvey, published by the F. J. Herr Printing Co., Columbus, Ohio. The second edition of this book has just been published. It is considerably enlarged, and contains a sketch of the life, call to the ministry and work of the author, as well as a collection of his poems. The book will be mailed to any address on receipt of sixty cents.

GIPSY SMITH'S MISSION HYMNAL, published by Biglow & Main Co., price, 35 cents, by mail, is the latest and most popular hymnal on the market for evangelistic and church services. It contains the words and music of "Never Give Up," the most popular song of the recent Brooklyn revival.

THE FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH.

"Take joy home,
And make a place in thy great heart for her,
And give her time to grow, and cherish her,
Then will she come and oft will sing to thee,
When thou art working in the furrows:
Or weeding in the sacred hour of dawn.
It is a comely fashion to be glad:
Joy is the grace we say to God."

TO-DAY

We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done to-day?
We shall give out gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give to-day?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear,
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear,
We shall speak with words of love and cheer,
But what have we done to-day?

We shall be so kind in the after while,
But what have we been to-day?
We shall bring to each lonely life a smile,
But what have we brought to-day?
We shall give to truth a grander birth,
And to steadfast faith a deeper worth,
We shall feed the hungering souls of earth,
But whom have we fed to-day?

A FRIENDLY GROCER

DROPPED A VALUABLE HINT ABOUT COFFEE.

"For about eight years," writes a Michigan woman, "I suffered from nervousness—part of the time down in bed with nervous prostration.

"Sometimes I would get numb and it would be almost impossible for me to speak for a spell. At others, I would have severe bilious attacks, and my heart would flutter painfully when I would walk fast or sweep.

"I have taken enough medicine to start a small drug store, without any benefit. One evening our grocer was asking Husband how I was, and he urged that I quit coffee and use Postum, so he brought home a package, and I made it according to directions, and we were delighted with it.

"So we quit coffee altogether and used only Postum. I began to get better in a month's time and look like another person, the color came back to my cheeks, I began to sleep well, my appetite was good, and I commenced to take on flesh and become interested in everything about the house.

"Finally, I was able to do all my own work without the least sign of my old trouble. I am so thankful for the little book, 'The Road to Wellville.' It has done me so much good. I haven't taken medicine of any kind for six months, and don't need any.

"A friend of ours who did not like Postum as she made it, liked mine, and when she learned to boil it long enough, her's was as good as mine. It's easy if you follow the directions." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a reason."

THE TURNING POINT IN FRIENDS' MISSIONARY WORK.

We have asked a few persons, deeply interested in the problems of foreign missions, to discuss the Proposed Plan to unite all our missionary work under one central board, and their articles appear in our issue of this week. It is interesting to find that they all unite in approving the Plan, and that, though representing widely separated sections of the country, they all feel the importance of this step toward union.

It is beyond question that we have now come to a turning point in our missionary endeavors, and the next step is a momentous one. There was a time, once, when foreign missionary work was a matter of individual concern. It was initiated among us by prophetic spirits, who had stirrings of heart and openings of vision for needy souls in remote lands. Little by little, yearly meetings took up, in their corporate capacity, the work, which at first rested on the heart of a very few, and the interest in the work increased in proportion as the responsibility for it was shared, until American Friends now have missionary stations in ten different countries.

As the field has been widening, the whole character of the foreign work has been changing. At first, the missionary's task was a quite simple one—he went out, in the love of the Gospel, to tell the heathen of salvation through Christ, and to turn them from idolatry to the one true God. The mission station was almost wholly a preaching station, and the main need was a man or woman who could make the natives of the various countries hear the Gospel persuasively in their own tongue. We have long ago passed that simple stage. We have awakened to the discovery that Christ did, and does, speak to the whole man; and we now know that the task of freeing a person from heathendom is a great and many-sided task.

The efficient mission station to-day deals with every aspect of the native's life. It is equipped with all the necessary medical and surgical appliances for saving life, for curing the body, and for relieving pain. The Christian doctor, with trained mind and trained hand, is there as well as the preacher, and all the poor sufferers of the region find in the hospital and dispensary a love and a care, which give them a practical revelation of the new spirit which Christ introduced. This care for the body, this skillful treatment of the ills of the flesh, is in every country the quickest way of approach to the heart of the sufferer, and, in the future, every mission station will have its medical staff.

We have also learned that the inhabitants of missionary countries are like our own children at home. They can be made morally and religiously safe only as they are educated. It is not enough to expel a false view of life; a new view must be inculcated and made to prevail. The mind must be trained and adjusted to a new ideal of life, and to new social conditions. Among the backward and undeveloped races there must be thorough and systematic industrial training to fit the natives for a more adequate method of life, and to develop thereby their personal capacity. If we undertake the missionary task at all, we must undertake to make the most that can be made out of the people whom we endeavor to help. The gospel of salvation must include the making of new men out of old races.

Now, all this complexity of missionary effort means that the foreign work cannot be done by individual initiative, nor, indeed, in any unorganized fashion. It calls for the concentrated wisdom of the whole church. It means, too, that we must focus our forces and perfect the work at a few places, rather than spread our energies loosely over many fields. We have means and power to form a few great centers of transformation; such, for instance, as have already been begun in Palestine and Japan. But the united church should be behind the whole work. The committee appointed by the Richmond Conference, last autumn, has drafted a Plan to make this united effort possible. This committee is not ready to have its "Constitution" published yet, but we give a summary of it to enable our readers to follow the papers intelligently, and we, ourselves, heartily approve the Proposed Plan. R. M. J.

ANOTHER SWEEPING DECISION AGAINST THE SALOON.

The courts of Indiana have just rendered another decision against the licensed saloon, which is more far-reaching in its scope even than that rendered two months ago by Judge Artman. The decision to which we refer was rendered on the 13th inst. by Judge Ira W. Christian, in the Circuit Court of Hamilton County. The decision was rendered on an affidavit alleging that Edward L. Sopher was maintaining a public nuisance in conducting a licensed saloon. The case against the saloon was managed by C. E. Newlin, who employed Doan and Orbison, the attorneys in the case decided by Judge Artman.

The issue was squarely presented before the Court as to whether the mere keeping and maintaining a place, where intoxicating liquors are sold at retail, to be drunk as a beverage on the premises, is a public nuisance at common law. The attorneys against the saloon maintained that the business itself, of liquor selling for beverage purposes, is inherently bad; and is destructive of public morals, public safety, public peace, and public health, and is, therefore, per se a public nuisance. The Judge fully sustained this contention, and his position is summed up at the end of his decision in the following words:

"Therefore, if the Constitution of the State of Indiana guarantees to the people their peace, their safety, their well-being, as it does in Section 1, Article I, of the Bill of Rights, it impliedly denies the right to the Legislature to pass any law which would injuriously affect the peace, safety and well-being of the people. And if the business of selling intoxicating liquors at retail is dangerous to and destructive of the peace, the safety, and the well-being of the people, as the long line of adjudged cases, already cited, have found, it clearly follows that a law creating and not restricting the right to engage in such business is antagonistic to Article I, Section 1, of the Constitution, and therefore unconstitutional."

This decision means that any saloon now under a license can be closed by criminal suit, which puts a mighty weapon into the hands of the opponent of the saloon, and everybody will wait with intense interest to see if Judge Christian's decision will be sustained by the higher courts.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Death has removed two Friends, who have for many years been rendering wide and varied service to the Church and to the world at large—Thomas Scattergood, Philadelphia, and William L. Pyle, Indianapolis. Thomas Scattergood died suddenly in Naples, having just reached Italy, after an extended trip through Egypt and Palestine. He was a devoted Friend, a liberal giver, a hospitable entertainer of visiting Friends, a public-spirited citizen, and a manager of a number of philanthropic and educational institutions, including Haverford and Bryn Mawr Colleges.

Wm. L. Pyle was a pillar of the Church in Western Yearly Meeting, a Friend of large experience, wise judgment, breadth of view and true spirituality. He was endowed with a great gift as Elder in the Church, and he has left a large void, which no one at present can fill.

The time for holding Kansas Yearly Meeting has been changed from Sixth-day, Tenth month 11th, to Tenth month 4th, for this year, to avoid conflicting with the time of holding the Five Years' Meeting, which convenes Tenth month 15th.

SYMPOSIUM ON PLAN FOR PROPOSED MISSIONARY UNION.

BY ROBERT E. PRETLOW, EDGAR H. STRANAHAN, FRANCIS A. WRIGHT, ELI REECE, AND
ELBERT RUSSELL.

[The following discussion is based upon a scheme drawn up by a committee appointed by the Missionary Conference, held at Richmond, Ind., Tenth month, last. It proposes that a representative board be appointed. (1st) to have a general oversight of the foreign missionary work of the several yearly meetings represented in the board where such has not been transferred to it; (2d) to enter new mission fields under certain conditions; and (3d) to control such mission work as any yearly meeting may see fit to transfer to it; also work now under independent Friends' missionary boards may be so transferred. This board is to be the sole agency of the various yearly meetings for the administration and control of all their foreign mission work. It is to be a Bureau of Information, is to examine and appoint candidates, allowing the yearly meeting boards the privilege, if they so elect, of selecting their own fields and nominating their own missionaries. Ample provisions are made for collecting and distributing funds. Administrative committees are to be appointed for each country where missions are carried on, all the missions in a country to be under the same administrative committee, e. g. those in Syria will be under one committee, those in Japan under another, and so on. A committee for educating Friends at home and fostering missionary interest is provided for, and a general secretary is to be employed, who can give his entire time to foreign missionary work, to carry on correspondence, gather statistics, aid yearly meeting boards in collecting funds, etc. He is to have as many assistants as are needed to do the work efficiently. The plan is tentative, and may be altered.—Ed.] :

No period of years since the death of the early giants of Quakerism has been so momentous to the Society of Friends as the first decade of the twentieth century. Whether it is fit to survive, whether it is able to so adapt itself to present day conditions as to reap and garner the fruits of the sowing of an earlier time, or whether it shall be set aside as an instrument once useful, but now outworn, are questions that are pressing rapidly toward a decision. After the passing of the first great group of leaders the Friends settled down, like Israel after the death of Joshua, into a condition of individuality gone to seed, where every man did that which was right in his own eyes, without much reference to what any one else was doing. The natural result was that so far as real aggressive effort was concerned the sum total was microscopically near the zero point. Like Israel, also, while the Friends, in a way and to some degree, held their own territory, their fertile fields became the favorite foraging grounds of their more aggressive neighbors.

However ideal this period ought to have been in theory, in fact it was a dreary period of large losses and meagre fruits. Israel's real progress, national, material, and spiritual, began when the people became willing to surrender some measure of personal privilege for public ends, and a prophet was found great enough to crystalize that spirit into co-operative organization.

We have experienced the same evils and felt the same needs. The same high spirit, too, has been working among us, and the first great step (a necessary, but incomplete one) taken under its impulse was the adoption of a uniform discipline with its creation of a central unified organization. The proposed unification of our missionary activities is another long and encouraging step in the line of brotherly co-operation in aggressive effort for the sake of increased efficiency.

The spectacle of a church with a total membership of less than 100,000 having its foreign mission work divided among 16 distinct and independent boards is surprising enough upon the face of it. The inevitable waste of means and energy, and the necessary lack of any general and coherent policy under such a system cannot fail to impress the most superficial observer.

But the situation is further complicated by the fact that sometimes two or more boards are operating in the same foreign field. The divided responsibility and conflict of authority in such cases cannot fail to be detrimental to the work. On the other hand, that two or three, or more boards seek to draw their support from the same or overlapping fields is the fruitful cause of friction and jealousy in the home church.

The proposed plan would seem to promise solution for the most obvious defects of our present system. It certainly is in line with the methods that have wrought the greatest advancement in other departments of the world's work.

The writer has heard but three objections seriously urged against the change.

First. That it would lessen the local interest in the particular field which that locality is now supporting. Of course, when the members of a yearly meeting become partners in all the missionary work of the church, their sympathies and interest are not likely to be narrowed to a particular field, as they now, unfortunately, too often are. The widening knowledge of what the united church is doing, that a wise administration of the proposed plan would likely produce, cannot fail to strengthen the missionary spirit so that the work in every field would be fortified rather than weakened. Furthermore, a large degree of personal responsibility for particular fields—quite as much as now exists with the large majority of the membership—is still left in the hands of the yearly meetings.

Second. The work of the yearly meetings would lose their identity. To some extent this would, undoubtedly, be true, as the scheme succeeds, and the whole becomes visibly greater than any part. But what are foreign missions organized for? To bring honor to a yearly meeting, and credit to the members of the board who manage its affairs, or to extend the borders of the kingdom of Christ? To merely state this question is quite sufficient answer to that objection.

Third. The danger of a burden of expense being sent down by quota from the five years' meeting to the yearly meetings. The financial nerve is very sensitive, and especially so when it comes to assessments. Assessed expenses are hard to raise, and an increase of them is to be wisely guarded against. A careful reading of the proposed plan side by side with Sec. 1, Chapter IV, Part IV, of the Constitution and Discipline, reveals no item of expense not already authorized under the present order of things. In fact, it is expressly stated in the Discipline that "The expense of the administration of the Board, not otherwise provided for, shall be apportioned to the several yearly meetings uniting in the work of the Board, according to the number of their members, and each yearly meeting shall raise its quota thereof in such manner as it may choose."

Article X, of the Proposed Plan, provides, "The administrative expenses of the American Friends' Board of Foreign Missions shall be paid from the general fund," no part of which fund is directed down in the form of a quota, either by the five years' meeting or by the Missionary Board. Thus, instead of increasing the amount apportioned among the various yearly meetings, the Proposed Plan actually diminishes it, so that no yearly meeting can be assessed for missionary funds unless it voluntarily assesses itself.

No one can forecast all the details of the operation of the new plan. They will have to be worked out through experience, under the guidance of the Spirit.

Three things, however, will be necessary on the part of us all to any real and satisfactory progress:

A supreme desire for the widening of Christ's kingdom.

A willingness to yield our own prejudices and pet projects for the common good.

A spirit of faith and confidence in each other.

No Christian work can prosper in an atmosphere of selfish obstinacy, or of mutual suspicion and distrust.

ROBERT E. PRETLOW.

Every one that has thought at all seriously on the subject of foreign missionary work among Friends in America is of the opinion that the present system of multiplied and multiplying boards is not ideal, to say the least. Every one that is actively interested in even a single board's work is well aware that the present condition, which is totally lacking in forces that co-ordinate, but prolific in means that antagonize, is one that must be improved or be superseded by another.

Under the present order or chaos as regards the inter-relations of boards, many undesirable features are constantly developing. There is now absolutely no agreement between boards (with possibly one exception) as to what shall be the attitude of each towards any home field considered as a source from which funds may be obtained. All localities are equally open to the solicitor of any board that may wish to enter them. A supreme love for one's own work, a lack of information as to the needs of other work, and, sad to say, in some few cases a disregard of the financial demands being made upon localities at certain times have conspired to make for the very opposite from co-operation. Men and women of fine missionary judgment are being almost forced into jealousy, bitterness, or even craftiness in zealous, legitimate efforts to provide for the maintenance and enlargement of certain stations. One group belongs to the board whose work has become especially precious to them because of years of closest intimacy; the other belongs to the board whose work is dear to them because they have given it birth and have cared for it through many vicissitudes. Each group is to be commended for its zeal, but the fact is only made more prominent as the zeal increases, that the groups constitute two distinct units absolutely separate, and in some cases even antagonistic. Now using considerable energy as friction, they would, under more favorable conditions, be expending it in the harmonious furtherance of the one cause that is common to both.

The missionary forces of the various yearly meetings surely recognize this friction as a stern reality, and certainly will consider no plan of union as tenable that does not contemplate within its scope the annihilation of this undesirable discord.

There is another factor of tremendous importance in the present consideration. Most of our numerous boards are composed of many members. A large number of individuals have consequently gained a considerable store of valuable information concerning the inner workings of missionary practices. This knowledge should not be lost by the placing of our whole missionary enterprise in the hands of a very few, but must be conserved for future years. Vital problems, such as come all too frequently to every board, will need, for their best solution, this widespread practical knowledge. The highest type of a plan for union will therefore embrace a method whereby this knowledge, born of experience, will be within easy reach of the needs.

Again, in accordance with the working of Quaker polity, a strong individuality has developed in our mission work. In this case, it is true, it has assumed the form of community individualism, if there be such a state. It is an individualism with mission boards as the integral part. Each board with its particular field has used its own methods, met its needs in its own way, and now feels that its knowledge of its station and its successful management of its own work have entitled it to a continued share in its progress. The feeling is not to be laughed out of court, neither can it be attributed to an over-estimation of a single group's ability. This solicitude for the future welfare of a particular station is the outgrowth of an intense interest, instilled through a long period of increasing knowledge, and of the fact that the possessors of it feel that the work is to some extent the workmanship of their own hands. This sense of proprietorship is a mighty element in any movement and must not be denied its rightful place in any new plan that hopes to be effective.

From the above it is seen that the writer holds three things, at least, to be necessarily embraced in a plan of union of our missionary forces:

First, the removal of all friction between boards. Second, the conserving of the experience and knowledge of the large number of individuals now assisting in our mission work. Third, the widening of the sense of proprietorship, until all Friends shall deem all Friends' mission work as their own.

The question yet remaining is, will the plan of union submitted by the Richmond Missionary Conference meet these requirements as above? It is hardly to be expected that all of the missionary problems that have accumulated through a half century are to be solved by the deliberations of a single conference, however wise its members may be. It is only in keeping with the movements of history to maintain that concessions must be granted and compromises be made, in order to bring about the best and most far-reaching results. The Conference itself set before us a splendid example in this regard.

Besides, it is to be borne in mind that the plan of union, as proposed, is not designed to be a complete code of rules for the regulation of all the various phases of the complex work of missions. Recommendation 2 of the propositions specifically sets forth the need of further legislation as to matters of organization, etc., and the method by which this is to be brought about. The plans are only basic for the details that are to be determined otherwise.

Now as to the effectiveness of the proposed plan for union. First, it is not to be denied that it provides a basis for union that is flexible enough to permit of any degree of union that may be desired. Either of the two extremes of a loose federation, or the absolute absorption of all the boards into one, may be accommodated under this plan. There is no doubt in my mind but that the plan is sufficient as a basis of union, in which friction may be removed. Second, the plan might at first sight appear to negative every notion of holding for the future the large number of Friends now directly concerned in the administrative affairs of our work. It may seem to look forward to a single, comparatively small board drawn from a limited territory. But while it might stimulate the idea of such centralization, it surely does not demand such.

It is difficult to imagine that the persons of fine missionary acumen, who will certainly constitute the body to which will be left the subject of administration methods, will even consider the idea of such a centralization. Even should the American Friends' Board, as newly constituted, unite on the plan of absorption of all the boards into one (an impossible thought) it is not likely that the democratic yearly meetings would tolerate it. For one, I am convinced that the administrative work must be parceled amongst a number of sub-boards or committees, in such a way as to insure the greatest efficiency and at the same time to maintain unity and harmony. This I believe to be possible under the provisions of the new plan and to be in keeping with its spirit.

Third, the matter of the sense of proprietorship is largely, if not entirely, dependent on a wide knowledge of a field and the possibility of having some part in the formation and execution of the plans pertaining to that field. Both of these are more than encouraged by the proposed plan. The wide dissemination of information concerning our work and workers is a fundamental portion of the plan. The plan seems to me to embrace possibilities for the introduction of even more persons into our missionary forces, and that, too, without complicating the course of procedure or multiplying unduly our machinery.

I think that the present plan of union is of itself inadequate for even the present needs, but do believe it is sufficient as a basis upon which a broader plan may be constructed. With the plan I am therefore pleased, believing that the American Friends' Board will be able to complete the steps necessary to provide a system of government for mission work that will be a mighty stimulation to all our missionary interests by uniting the forces and perfecting the methods of action.

EDGAR H. STRANAHAN.

What is known as the plan of union, described in the article itself as "propositions as . . . a basis of the union of all the missionary work of American Friends," was unanimously adopted by the conference on the subject held at Richmond, Ind., Tenth month 24 and 25, 1906.

At this conference representatives were present from all the American yearly meetings, or their missionary boards or associations. The presence and actions of these representatives indicated that the thought that a closer union of the missionary work of Friends was desirable extended throughout the entire Society.

To carry out the proposition on the lines intended by the conference requires that it shall be affirmatively approved by each yearly meeting at its next session, in order that the union might be made effective at the time of the five years' meeting. In order that the yearly meetings shall act upon it intelligently, it is desirable that Friends should carefully and prayerfully consider the matter in advance. The fact that this plan did receive the approval of every member of the conference, without a dissenting vote, certainly entitles it to such a consideration.

The proposed plan of union, in common with all human arrangements, has disadvantages as well as advantages. The question which must be decided is, will the advantages to the work under the proposed plan of union outweigh its disadvantages, and such advantages as are possessed by the present plan of separate control of their missionary work by each yearly meeting?

The present American Friends' Board of Foreign Missions is composed of members appointed by the yearly meetings composing the five years' meeting. It has power, with the approval of two-thirds of its members, to "assume control of such missionary work, as any yearly meeting may see fit to transfer to it." It may also arrange for the representation on the Board of yearly meetings not members of the five years' meeting.

The proposed plan starts out on the assumption that the missionary work of all the yearly meetings will be transferred to the Board, as soon as all the meetings have had time to approve of the proposition, and provides, in Article I, for representation of all of the yearly meetings in America on the Board, on the same basis as to membership as is now in force for the meetings composing the five years' meeting alone.

The remaining ten articles are simply those necessary to make this change effective. If the proposed change is a good one, and can be accomplished, most of the articles proposed, or similar ones, will be necessary to govern the conduct of the work.

Article VII, allowing yearly meeting boards the privilege, subject to the approval of the Board, of selecting their own foreign field and nominating their own missionaries, appears to have been inserted to overcome the possible opposition of some of those who might be unwilling to surrender entire control of the work now under their care. To me this article seems superfluous. I believe yearly meetings will realize the advantages of one controlling board, and will either not avail themselves or soon cease to avail themselves of this article, and it will become obsolete.

Article IX, in its present form, appears to me to apply solely to yearly meeting boards availing themselves of Article VII, and I think it will also soon prove superfluous.

Article X is a necessary one if yearly meetings outside of the five years' meeting join the Board, and will relieve the five years' meeting from an obligation in regard to the expenses of the A. F. B. of F. M., which has been a difficult problem for the finance and auditing committees to handle, and a source of much dissatisfaction during the last five years.

The advantages of the proposed union may be described in one sentence. The greater power of such a board to accomplish results. In union is strength; a board representing all the yearly meetings will have a weight with missionary boards of other denominations, in arranging for location of missions, or division of missionary territory, etc., that our present numerous small boards cannot have. It will have power to employ such traveling secretaries or agents as seems desirable either in visiting mission fields or in attending yearly meetings, explaining the conditions and needs of the work. It will be able to make better arrangements for the examination and preparation of candidates for missionary work than would be possible with our separate boards. It can arrange for the mutual exchanging of work, or the relieving and assisting of each other by missionaries at stations sufficiently near together, which would now be almost impracticable, because such stations are controlled by entirely independent boards. This power would prove of especial advantage in the introduction of new workers, as it would allow opportunities for them to learn the languages and customs of the people among whom they are to work not now available. It will be able to make a better distribution of funds and workers, according to the more pressing needs of the various fields, than is possible under our present divided system of control. It can avail itself of the services of missionaries on furlough, or other persons posted on the work, to arouse enthusiasm and solicit contributions anywhere and at any time, without fear that in so doing it may trench on the necessary support for the work at any point.

It has unfortunately proven in the past that a conflict seems frequently to arise in regard to the solicitation of funds in various meetings for one mission, when these meetings are already in a sense pledged to the support of some other mission. This does not arise purely from a spirit of jealousy, though it may promote such a spirit. While the idea is very prevalent that larger funds can be obtained for missionary purposes, where meetings are held responsible for a particular work, it is very doubtful whether the gain, if any, from such responsibility, is not more than offset by the repressive influence such a responsibility exercises on contributions for other fields. At any rate, there is no doubt that some missionary boards have thought it necessary to interfere to prevent, as far as possible, solicitation for other work than that for which they are responsible. This would indicate that the fact of their own meetings being responsible for a work is not sufficient to restrain their members from contributing to other work, or to ensure their furnishing sufficient funds to support the work for which their meetings are responsible. I believe much larger contributions for missionary work can be secured by the plan of soliciting for funds for all the work of Friends anywhere.

Another advantage of the union would be the better distribution of funds among the different fields. The missionaries at any point see the needs of the fields near them. There are probably none of these fields where the work could not be extended, but extension cannot be of equal necessity or advisability at all of them at the same time. Under the present system, the work cannot be extended at any point, until the particular board in charge of that work can control the necessary funds. Two boards might together have enough to start extension at one point, but each would have to wait until it had sufficient funds before either work could be commenced, and possibly there might be a work of pressing necessity at some other point for which nothing could be done, because the board in charge of it had no surplus funds. The conference was informed that it has been the experience of other churches having one central board that the missionaries themselves help the boards to decide where the work should be extended first, when there are pressing calls for extensions, only a few of which can be granted.

Now a word as to the advantages of the proposed plan of union. The one which will naturally be first raised is that the meetings now controlling any missionary work understand the needs of that work better, and are therefore better fitted to carry it on than the central board would be. This disadvantage, I believe, is more apparent than real. These boards themselves are subject to change by their own yearly meetings. If a committee appointed by New England Yearly Meeting can successfully manage a mission in Palestine, 5,000 or 6,000 miles away, why could not a similar committee appointed by New York Yearly Meeting, less than 200 miles farther away, do the same? If committees in Oregon and Kansas and California, separated by over 1,000 miles from each other, can successfully manage separate work in Alaska, at different points, why could not a board in Indiana do the same?

Of course it may take a little time for the new board to learn the necessities of all the different locations, but, as indicated above, it would probably have better opportunities to ascertain these through its traveling secretary than the present boards have, and there should be nothing to prevent its having the counsel and assistance of the present boards as long as same might be necessary.

The greatest obstacle to the proposed union, I believe, will be in the unwillingness of some of the yearly meetings, or their boards, to give up control of the work which has been under their care, which they almost regard as their own work. Should they consider it their own work, or the Lord's work? If it is truly the Lord's work then the only point they should consider is, what does the Lord want done in the matter? Unless they are satisfied that they can carry on His work more effectively than such a central board could, they will be placing their own preferences above the interests of the work they claim they are doing for the Lord, if they are unwilling to transfer it to the central board.

I apprehend this question should be settled on the broad basis of the best interests of all missionary work conducted or controlled by Friends in America. If Friends are convinced that a Union is desirable, either on the lines proposed or on some other lines, then I do not believe any one yearly meeting would hold back, simply from a selfish desire to retain control of what they have heretofore regarded as their own special work.

The feasibility of having all the mission work of Friends in America placed under the care of one committee is, I think, proven by the success which has attended, for over a third of a century, the joint control of work among the Indians by a committee appointed by all the yearly meetings.

In the earlier portion of this period very grave responsibilities were thrown upon this committee, and it required much tact and good judgment on its part to successfully meet the various issues as they arose. I do not suppose there is a single person who does not believe that the Indian work of Friends has been more successful, under this joint management, than it could possibly have been if each yearly meeting had retained separate control of one or more missions.

It has been my privilege to have been a member of the missionary board of my own yearly meeting during the greater portion of the past 16 years, and to have been a member of the American Friends' Board of Foreign Missions since its inception. My experience on these boards has convinced me that such a union as proposed is very desirable.

While, as stated above, it was the hope of the conference that every yearly meeting would be prepared for such a union in October, 1907, with which hope I heartily unite, it will not necessarily follow that the plan must be abandoned, even if some of the yearly meetings may not see their way to unite in it at this time.

FRANCIS A. WRIGHT.

The Missionary Conference, which met last autumn at Richmond, Ind., was one of the repeated cries of a divided church for a restored unity.

It is not simply fashionable to talk about unity—the needs of the case demand it.

Our question is the universal one—"How shall we unite?" "What shall form the basis of union?" We will probably all agree that a close centralization is the most powerful, the most expeditious and the most economical organization possible, provided the center is sound and strong. But centralization must be made exceedingly flexible if the Quaker spirit, which has long ago cast off its ropes and bands, is to work freely and frictionless. We must remember, however, that our independence must come through the proper observance of the law of dependence.

Quakers live in the same world that other Christians live in, and are subject to the same laws of spirit, ethics and economy.

The greatest and most common blunder of Quakerism is that we try to work ideal plans without ideal people or ideal circumstances with which to work them; and this more than anything else accounts for the smallness of our numbers and the awful failure we have made to stamp the Quaker personality upon all phases of the religious, social and civic life of the nations, rather than on packages of a peculiar brand of breakfast food. It is far more important that the command of Jesus should be obeyed than that any peculiar theory should be maintained, for the kernel of all religious theories should be obedience and should be permeated with the spirit of the "Great Commission."

The proposition to unite the work of all the Friends' mission boards of America under one head is a test of the cohesiveness of Quakerism. If it will not stand the test it is time we know it, and, if it does, we can thank God and go ahead. My readers will no doubt see before they get through how that which I have already written bears on the proposed constitution and by-laws, which, I take for granted, they have all read.

There is probably no living Quaker who would have given us a better draft than James Carey, Jr., has done. It shows skill and insight and carries the marks of a Christian business man. I have but one criticism, and that is what he calls the administrative or field committees. I am very sure that this feature is not according to James Carey's best business judgment for carrying on a great business enterprise, but simply a compromise, for fear that some would not follow willingly if we start with a full-fledged central board with executive power.

My belief is that the proposed plan would take us by a very indirect way, beset with entanglements, when there is an air-line route by which danger and expense will be reduced to the minimum. My reasons for this conclusion are these: (1) There is a very simple law of centralization, one phase of which is there must be a central head with authority. If the administrative committee has no authority then the law of centralization is violated. If it has not authority and is only advisory, then the yearly meeting boards are the ones to advise, and not a new committee.

(2) These administrative or field committees are each to be composed of members of the boards of two or more yearly meetings. Now, suppose North Carolina and Baltimore are associated as the committee for the "Spanish-speaking countries." This committee should meet at least once each month. This is utterly impracticable, for the distance is too great.

(3) Some yearly meeting boards must surrender work which they have carried long, and see that work go under the advisory care of those who know very little about that particular field. Take for illustration New York, Indiana and North Carolina. Each have work among Spanish-speaking people. Now, no two of these can be associated together as an administrative committee on account of their remoteness from each other. Hence, if it is delegated to North Carolina and Baltimore, will New York and Maryland surrender their work gracefully and see those who are far less competent to advise (on account of less experience in that field) put in their stead? I fear not; and yet this awkward position will confront almost every yearly meeting board.

(4) The duties outlined for the administrative committee will conflict with the advisory functions which would naturally fall to the yearly meeting boards (see Sec. 6, Nos. 4, 6, 8).

(5) A great many among the best of our business men have never been reached for missions, because we have shown so little judgment in business management. They wanted to help along in the work, but the poor business methods used by the average board silences their conviction. This is the greatest enterprise ever undertaken by man, and it must be put on a basis that will appeal to men who are sensitive to the law of expedients.

These administrative committees must be formed from the Central Executive Committee.

Now, my belief is that it would be far better to leave out the administrative committee entirely. Let us look at it from this viewpoint: Suppose that 15 of the best qualified (spiritually and intellectually) Friends within a radius of 100 miles of Indianapolis, with 2 such men as James Carey, Jr., or Absalom Rosenberger, or J. J. Mills, as secretaries (and men of this type we must have), could any yearly meeting suffer by putting its work into such hands? North Carolina is ready to make her deposit of the work in Cuba to this central board, for then she will belong to the world field, and she can hear the cry of all and her heart will open wide and then her purse-string will loosen.

I am sure no central board would dare, or even desire to assume the care of a field, without freely and fully advising, for a long time, with the board that has had it under its management. It may not be advisable for this central committee to take over all work at once; but gradually, as they may gain a thorough knowledge of the field. It may take a long time for New England to make her transfer, but we should remember that most boards follow the advice of missionaries, regarding the work on the field.

Let the yearly meeting boards still advise the central board and co-operate in every way. If it takes three or five, or ten years to complete the transfer of the work to the central board, one may not be at all surprised.

Some have the impression that all the members of this central board must be selected from Indiana and Western yearly meetings. There are two secretaries and very likely two editors of a missionary magazine, who will probably be selected from other yearly meetings. These should be members of this board, and, from the very nature of the case, would be its most influential members, so there is no good ground for fear lest these two yearly meetings shall dominate the policy of the Board.

You will notice that what I have called the Central Board is the same as the American Friends' Board. It is to be hoped that the plan of electing the members of the board may be so arranged that each yearly meeting may have an even chance in selecting the several members of the board. It may be the best plan to leave it to this A. F. B. F. M., appointed by the several yearly meetings to select this central board, which would then be called the Central Executive Board. By this plan, the present instruction of the Discipline would not be violated. The coming five years' meeting can give power to the A. F. B. F. M. to carry its work on through the Executive Board as outlined above, while the board, as it now exists, will be the responsible body back of the movement. These members of the board who are also members of the boards in the different yearly meetings will form a tie between the yearly meetings and this central board, which is a feature we must surely maintain.

I have put in days and weeks and months in studying this problem, trying to find another way that will meet our need without this Central Executive Board, but I can see no way out if we propose to do the great work as quickly and as expeditiously as God demands. If we are not going to centralize in reality, let's remain as we are and live in harmony of spirit.

ELI REECE.

The proposed union of Friends' foreign missionary work marks a new era in our history. Heretofore foreign missionary work has been chiefly the concern of individuals or the task of auxiliary organizations among us. Now it is becoming a prominent part of the work of our Society as an organization—a concern of all Friends.

Our present arrangements for conducting missionary work are the result of the long period of development, which produced the foreign missionary interest and built up the various agencies that now carry on the work. The proposed union is an effort to eliminate the wastes, complications, and conflicts of our present lack of system. The larger problems that the proposed plan seeks to solve are three.

First. To secure more effective and intelligent supervision of the whole work. Each yearly meeting board by itself can not afford to employ secretaries or superintendents to give their whole time to the work, make thorough and comprehensive studies of the field, visit the mission stations regularly, and keep the members of the yearly meeting informed as to the needs and opportunities of the mission. All the yearly meetings acting together can, however, afford one or two such agents, without using for that purpose too large a percentage of its available missionary funds.

Secondly. To simplify the machinery of administration. Often two or more yearly meetings are at work in the same field. They maintain separate boards of management, printing presses, schools and other equipment. In such cases, one managing board could do the work for the whole field. An interchange of workers in such a field is often desirable, but with two boards it is often a matter of long correspondence and delay. An agent sent to look after the work of one yearly meeting could, without much additional expense, look after the work of the other on the same tour. One secretary could attend to the work of both with little more than half the expense. But if such an arrangement is desirable from the point of view of economy and effectiveness of administration for a single field like the Spanish-speaking countries, the same considerations, in only a slightly less degree, make a union of all the work desirable.

Thirdly. To avoid competition in seeking funds for the support of the work. The overlapping of missionary interests among us has led to unseemly rivalry between our missionary boards and jeopardized the success of the work. The Friends' African Industrial Mission Board, composed of members appointed by various yearly meetings, duplicates, to a large extent, the home field and organization of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions. The latter undertook the administration of the Cuban work to prevent the formation of another such inter-yearly meeting board. Each of these boards must have funds to carry on its work, and by its constitution has the right to solicit support of the members of its constituent yearly meetings. But this makes them competitors for missionary funds with each other and with the local yearly meeting board of every yearly meeting that is carrying on missionary work of its own. Such a condition becomes intolerable. Each of these boards must plan its work and send out its missionaries in advance. The missionaries must not be left in a foreign country, often among a hostile people, without funds. Cases are not unknown in which missionaries have become invalids for life from trying to live on an insufficient diet while the remittances failed to come, because the board at home could not raise money. For it is easily possible that the usual contributions to one board may fall short $1,000 a year, because interesting speakers or good solicitors for another board have canvassed the home field first, and secured unusually large contributions from persons who had been accustomed to contribute to the work of the former board. Now it is evident that the system that makes so much uncertainty in the income of the various boards is wrong, rather than the boards who are victims of it. There is, apparently, enough money for all, but the work cannot be rightly carried on until these fluctuations in its distribution can be prevented.

These are the conditions that led to the Missionary Conference, at Richmond, last fall. Two plans to solve these problems were considered by the conference. One provided for a federation of the organizations now doing foreign missionary work, allowing each to continue in control of its work, but putting all under the supervision of the American Friends' Board, which should exercise only advisory powers, acting as a bureau of information and an instrument for promoting greater interest and uniformity in the work. After thorough discussion it was seen that this plan did not solve the problems which were before the conference. There is no yearly meeting strong enough to take over the Cuban Mission or the African Industrial Mission and support it in addition to the work for which it is already solely responsible. Unless this could be done, the disturbing competition between the various boards would go on. Neither would such a federation obviate the unnecessary machinery where two or more yearly meetings are at work in a single field, as in Mexico.

Consequently, the other plan, which provides for putting the actual administration of all the work in the hands of a single board, was adopted. To all those present at the conference and to me, after considering it some six months, the plan of union seems the inevitable outcome of our present situation, and gives promise of a period of aggressive missionary work for the ever-wider spreading of the kingdom of the Saviour of the world.

ELBERT RUSSELL.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting met in their annual assembly last week for the two hundred and twenty-sixth time. The sittings were well attended by both older and younger, and the interest manifested by the latter was very encouraging. About 75 representatives were appointed by the men from the different quarterly meetings, everyone being present when their names were called, except two. Both these, being unable to attend, sent word to the meeting by a fellow representative, asking to be excused. The women Friends also had a very full attendance. The sense of duty, when appointed as a representative, or on a committee, is very commendable among Philadelphia Friends. Men's and women's meetings hold separate sessions. When a concern arises in the mind of a Friend to visit "the other side of the house," messengers are sent across to carry the "concern" to the other body, which usually approves and appoints a time when the concerned Friend may appear. This year one of the women Friends visited the men's meeting with an exhortation for younger Friends to be careful in the small duties of life, especially those connected with Friendly practice.

The meeting does not recognize visiting Friends from other yearly meetings in any official way. The ministers and elders, however, invite worthy visitors to sit with them, facing the body of the meeting, and any message from them is reverently received. This year Johan Marcussen, Denmark; Thomas Davison, England; Timothy B. Hussey, Maine; Cyrus Cooper, Ohio; David F. White, Joshua Fisher, Abram Fisher, and Benjamin Brown, North Carolina, were among those who sat with the men. Ida Chamness, Iowa, and Eliza Varney, Canada, sat with the women.

The discipline was amended, so that in places where the membership of a monthly and preparative meeting is identical, the preparative meeting may hand over its business to the monthly meeting and meet only at the call of the overseers. This will simplify the work in a number of places, and will probably become operative as soon as their business can be adjusted.

The printed invitation addressed to those outside of the Society, who might be interested in Friends' meetings for worship, which was prepared by a group of concerned Friends and afterward approved and published by the "Meeting for Sufferings," called forth expressions of appreciation from many. One of the elderly Friends thought that it was an evidence of "the bubbling up of life among our younger Friends," and felt it right that older Friends should recognize it and rejoice. Another said it evidenced a "growing sentiment favoring a wider outlook." The spirit evidenced by the "invitation" and its reception indicate a growth of wider sympathies and true Christian fellowship and charity.

A communication from London Yearly Meeting was referred to a committee, which reported the substance of the message, and the clerk was directed to acknowledge the receipt of the communication. It has been fifty years since a communication from another yearly meeting has been received—1857 being the date when Philadelphia Yearly Meeting ceased her correspondence with other yearly meetings.

Another evidence of new life among the members is the "concern" which has arisen with some of the ministers and a number of younger Friends, to visit meetings, especially those in country districts and smaller places. This quickening claimed the attention of the meeting, and many encouraged those with such "concerns" to move forward at the bidding of the Master.

The religious and philanthropic activities of Philadelphia Friends are carried on by independent associations and boards, which hold their annual meetings during yearly meeting week in the afternoons and evenings at Twelfth Street Meeting House. This year the Cuban Committee, the Peace Association, the Friends' Freedmen's Association, the Foreign Missionary Association, the Temperance Association, the Friends' First-day School Association, and the Indian Aid Association presented their reports, with addresses, papers and discussions. The amount and quality of work done by these associations index much consecration, a great deal of time and money being expended through them for the advancement of the cause of truth and the betterment of society. Among the speakers from outside the associations, who appeared on the programs, were Martin G. Brumbaugh, former Commissioner to Porto Rico, who spoke at the Cuban Committee meeting; William C. Dennis, Assistant Solicitor of the State Department at Washington, and Professor of International Law in Washington University, who spoke before the Peace meeting; Henry W. Frost, of the China Inland Mission, and Ume Tsuda, principal of a girls' school in Tokio, who spoke at the Missionary meeting; P. A. Baker, General Superintendent of the American Anti-Saloon League, who addressed the Temperance meeting, and John R.

Cary, Baltimore, who talked to the First-day School Association. Beside these, a number of the members presented papers and took part in the discussions. A visiting Friend, who was present at a number of these meetings, said that the conditions under which these activities are carried on in Philadelphia favor efficiency, since they win their way and survive, because they prove themselves worth while.

JOSEPH, THE WISE RULER IN EGYPT.

First-day, Fifth mo. 5.—Working for good. Rom. 8: 18-28.

Time.—Uncertain; possibly, about 1650 B. C.

Place.—Probably, either Zoan, near one of the mouths of the Nile, or Heliopolis, or On, about six miles northeast of modern Cairo.

Persons.—Joseph about thirty years old; Jacob, living at Hebron, possibly about one hundred and twenty years old.

Monarch—Good scholars think that the Pharaoh of Joseph was one of the last dynasty of the Hyksos, of shepherd kings, and possibly Apepa, the last of the important kings of those dynasties.

The chief butler, on his return to prosperity, had apparently forgotten Joseph, and not until the occurrence of Pharaoh's dreams, two years later, was the Hebrew young man brought to mind. The chief butler, seeing the king's perplexity and anxiety, mentions Joseph. Pharaoh immediately sends for him. Joseph behaves himself modestly before the monarch, disclaims any power of his own, ascribing all to God. On hearing the dreams, Joseph gives satisfactory explanations. Here the lesson begins. Chapter 41: 1-37, should be read.

38. Joseph's suggestions commended themselves to Pharaoh.

39. Who could be so fitted for the post suggested, as the interpreter himself, who, by his suggestion, had shown how well he understood the conditions?

40. "Over my house."—Palace. Compare Is. 22: 15. "Be ruled." Literally, "order themselves." "Only in the throne," etc. Thou shalt be next to me in authority. Such an appointment as this was not an extraordinary thing. The Pharaoh was a Syrian, that is, of foreign extraction—and such a man would be more likely to do a thing of this kind than a native Egyptian.

41. "Signet ring." A badge of authority. See Est. 3: 10; 8: 2. "Fine linen." Such as was worn by men of rank. The Egyptians were famous for this fabric. "A gold chain." Another Egyptian sign of royal favor and high rank.

43. "Second chariot." Next to the king. "Cried before him." As if he were a king.

44. "I am Pharaoh." As much as to say, I am the monarch, and this shall be done.

45. "Called Joseph's name." He gave him an Egyptian name. "Zaph-e-nath Panne-ah." The meaning is not certain; possibly it is, "God spake and he (the man) came into life." "Asenath." "Belonging to Neath," a goddess. "Potiphra." "Ra" is the name of the sun-god. "On." A city which was the center of sun worship. The high priest of this temple was a most important dignitary, and so the rank of Joseph was confirmed by this marriage. The Greeks called the city Heliopolis (City of the Sun). Gen. 46:20.

46. "Stood before Pharaoh." That is, was his officer of State. Deut. 1:38; I Kings 12:6.

47. See verses 18, 22.

48. "He gathered up . . . and laid up." A wise and practical hint for all, and embodied in many proverbs. Having absolute power, Joseph could not only reserve the amount due in the shape of taxes, but, in other ways, secure large amounts of grain. Granaries were common in Egypt, and there are representations of them on the monuments.

Famines in Egypt, due to the failure of the Nile to overflow its banks, and hence fit the land for crops, are not uncommon. One of seven years' duration is recorded in the eleventh century A. D. The failure of the Nile to rise is due to lack of rainfall in the country of the upper waters of the river. That the famine in question should extend to Canaan can only be explained by supposing that there was a simultaneous failure of rain in that country. It does not follow that this was seven years, also, and from Gen. 45:6 it would seem to have been but two years.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Foresight, forethought, promptness in action are inestimable characteristics.

2. Ecclesiastes 9:10.

Christian Endeavor.

TOPIC FOR FIFTH MONTH FIFTH, 1907.

THE POWER OF A CONTENTED LIFE.

Phil. 4:10-20. (Consecration meeting.)

Second-day, Fourth mo. 29.—A contented king. Ps. 16:1-11.
Third-day, Fourth mo. 30.—Goodness satisfies. Prov. 14:1-14.
Fourth-day, Fifth mo. 1.—Content with little. Eccl. 4:1-6.
Fifth-day, Fifth mo. 2.—Content with wages. Luke 3:1-14.
Sixth-day, Fifth mo. 3.—Content with work. I Cor. 7:17-20.
Seventh-day, Fifth mo. 4.—Content with godliness. I Tim. 6:1-8.

The lesson that Paul had learned is no easy one. It is a lifetime undertaking for many, and thousands never achieve it. It is, that contentment has its origin within, and that no outward state whatever has power to make or mar. As Samuel Johnson wisely said: "The fountain of content must spring up in a man's own mind; and he who has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his own disposition will waste his life in fruitless efforts, and multiply the griefs which he proposes to remove."

It took Jacob a good many years to learn that blessedness lies not so much in rank and outward advantage as in a single heart, and a conscience void of offense. And Jacob, as one not yet having attained, has abundant companionship to-day. Every man or woman who consents to sacrifice principle for apparent temporal gain is in the same class with him. Isaac's God was the same as He of whom Paul declared that He would fulfill every need. But Jacob undertook along his own lines, and not God's. Haste as to time and human choice as to plan mar many a good purpose of God.

Paul learned more than the doctrine of contentment; he learned to be content. He was not satisfied with preaching the unattained—from the standpoint of a theorist, but he set the seal to his teaching by witnessing to the experience. "Getting religion" is not the final step toward contentment. Read the list in Peter's series of addenda, and see where patience comes in. Paul warns Timothy against those who think of godliness as a way of gain. Such persons, in their disappointment, are not only a burden to themselves, but to others as well. But having a knowledge of the salvation offered in Christ is the most important beginning of a contented life.

We need not wait for satisfaction before we feel contentment. Nor can mere resolve make us contented; it is rather one of the fruits of a well-ordered life, full of obedience and of faith. We are always to press on to better things beyond, because in that direction lies godliness. But that does not preclude—it rather demands—the glad acceptance of to-day's joys and duties, privileges and discipline, as the God-given present, which is the steppingstone to the God-promised future.

Correspondence.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

By order of the Permanent Board of Kansas Yearly Meeting, the opening of our next yearly meeting is changed to Sixth-day, Tenth month 4, 1907, instead of Tenth month 11th, as in the printed programs, to avoid a confliction with the time of holding the Five Years' Meeting.

WM. Q. ELLIOTT,
Presiding Clerk.

NATHAN BROWN,

Recording Clerk.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Will THE AMERICAN FRIEND kindly allow me a little space for an appeal to Friends' Sabbath-schools in the United States and Canada? I wish to urge the importance of united action on the part of Friends in the observance of a "Peace Day" on Fifth month 19, 1907. Friends are aware, of course, that Fifth month 18th, is the anniversary of the opening of The Hague Court of Arbitration. That event, marking, as it does, the adoption of reason and righteousness in diplomacy, and the acceptance of the principles of peace and constructive statesmanship in international affairs as contrasted with the distrustful, deceptive Machiavellian diplomacy of the older time, and the destructive, barbaric methods of war, ought to appeal so strongly to Friends that it would be a pleasure, as well as a duty, to keep the day in a manner befitting its world-wide significance.

In order, then, that Friends may take their rightful position in this great modern movement for obtaining the rule of right and of reason in the governments of men, let me suggest that all the Sabbath-schools under the control of Friends in America unite in observing the anniversary of Fifth month 18, 1899, with exercises appropriate for the occasion.

The primary purpose is, of course, to keep our pupils and members well informed and maintain in them a keen interest in this live subject, in order that both young and old may recognize in the Man of Galilee not only the Saviour of men from sin, but also to recognize Him as the Prince of Peace, and thus realize that when the government is upon his shoulders (as it should be), He will be the Saviour of men from war and international strife. All men will then be brethren, and brethren love each other, and, hence, cannot fight.

Very sincerely,

ROBT. C. ROOT,

Supt. of Peace in California Yearly Meeting.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Chas. S. Carter was appointed clerk, and Walter L. More for assistant clerk of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting this year.

Charles Lescault, Cherokee, Okla., recently held a series of revival meetings at Emporia, Kan. Success attended his efforts.

Twenty odd dollars were received this week for the Chinese Relief Fund, $15.82 of which was contributed by Coloma Meeting, Park County, Ind.

The young Friends in New York City held a Fellowship Conference, on the 20th inst. Anna M. Moore and Herman Newman took part in the exercises.

Mills E. Raiford, a minister from Corinth Monthly Meeting, Conley, Va., has just returned from a religious visit to Patuxent, Baltimore, and Washington.

The Ministers' Associations of Western and Indiana Yearly Meetings are making arrangements for a joint session. The time and place will be announced later.

Johan Marcussen, Denmark, attended a recent meeting of Ministry and Oversight, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and wrote, in a private letter, the following: "Very good. Good as can be amongst men."

Vanwert Quarterly Meeting, for Fifth month 3d to 5th, will meet at Rockford, Ohio, instead of Tama, Ohio. Rockford is situated on the C. & N. R. R. Friends contemplating attendance should note the change.

The evening meetings, held at Twelfth Street Meeting House, Philadelphia, during yearly meeting week, were well attended. A free lunch was given each evening, between 6.30 and 7.15 P. M. One evening 466 persons were served.

John C. Thomas, a minister from Baltimore, and Miles White, Jr., recently visited at Conley, Va., in the interest of Corinth Academy. The former attended Friends' meeting at Black Creek, where he preached a sermon that was much appreciated.

Seneca H. and Alice E. Stevens have transferred their membership from Greenwich Monthly Meeting, New England Yearly Meeting, to Marlborough Monthly Meeting, New York Yearly Meeting. At the same time these certificates were accepted, one person was received by letter from the Presbyterian Church, and two others by request.

Chas. and Mary Replogle, Everett, Wash., recently held a series of meetings at Langley, Wash., 13 sessions in all, in which the church was strengthened, and the Gospel preached with much power. The meetings were well attended. Seven new accessions to the meeting resulted, and more will probably join Friends soon.

Part of the building known as the Institute rooms, in connection with the meeting-house at 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, has been altered, providing larger space for a dining room and kitchen. Supper was served each evening during yearly meeting week, and the new department added to the comfort and convenience of the many visiting Friends.

Indiana Ellis, a member of Wilmington Yearly Meeting, recently spent a few days in Washington, D. C. She attended Philadelphia Yearly meeting and found much which reminded her of former days in Indiana and Western Yearly Meeting. She met a number of old acquaintances from Ohio and Indiana, and her visit was even more enjoyable than she had anticipated.

On the 31st ult., Friends of hairmount, Ind., gave for missions something more than $100. Part of this amount was given to Arthur and Edna Chilson, who acceptably attended the meeting that day. A box filled with packages, one to be opened each month of the year, for five years, had also been previously prepared for these outgoing missionaries to Africa. This meeting has also raised about $30 for the Chinese sufferers.

The meeting at Worcester, Mass., formerly known as Uxbridge Monthly Meeting, has changed its name to Worcester Monthly Meeting. Earl J. Harold, formerly of Richmond, Ind., has been doing pastoral work in this meeting for nearly three years. The meeting is in a prosperous condition, ten active, and three associate members were received at the monthly meeting in Third month. A new meeting-house is about to be constructed on the old site, on Oxford Street. It is to be of brick, with stone trimmings, and with a seating capacity of about 400.

A recent letter to Alex. M. Purdy, Palmyra, N. Y., from our aged friends, Chas. F. and Rhoda M. Coffin, Chicago, gives us a touch of sentiment becoming lives well spent in service: "It was very pleasant to us to learn that another member of the 'old guard,' with whom we were associated in years past, still lives. We are eighty-four and eighty-one years of age, and have withdrawn almost entirely from the work in which our lives have been spent, and are leading a quiet, peaceful, happy old age, looking back over life with satisfaction, and forward with the fulness of hope."

The spring term of school began at Oakwood Seminary on Fourth month 9th. The attendance is somewhat less than during the winter, but is fully up to the average for this time of year. The school work next year will be in charge of practically the same teachers as this year. On the morning of the tenth, the "National Temperance Evangelist," Geo. H. Vibbert, Massachusetts, addressed the school on the evils of tobacco-using, and on the evening of the same day he gave a temperance address in the assembly room.

Early in the present winter the Philadelphia Peace Association of Friends offered two prizes, one of $40.00, and the other of $20.00, for the two best essays on "International Friendship: Its Recent Growth and Practical Significance." The competition was open to the pupils of the Central High School, the Central Manual Training High School, and the Northeast Manual Training High School; and it was announced that the essays would be judged according to the clearness and force of thought shown by the writers in presenting the practical, rather than the theoretical or sentimental aspects of the subject.

Pamphlet literature was supplied by the Association to each of the 28 pupils who applied for it, and the libraries of the schools were given a set of some of the best books on the peace question. When the time limit expired, Third month 10th, there were 13 essays ready to be put into the hands of the judges. For this service, the Association was fortunate in securing such eminent educators as Dr. Carl Kelsey, Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Don C. Barrett, Dean of the Faculty and Professor of Economics at Haverford College, and Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, Professor of Philosophy and Biblical Literature at Swarthmore College.

The essays were found to be of considerable interest, most of them ranking high for students of high school age, showing careful preparation and clear thought, as well as neatness of form and good penmanship. One of the contestants was from the Central Manual Training High School, and the remaining 12 from the Central High School, members of the Senior, Junior and Sophomore classes.

The first prize was awarded to Harry Newmayer, Senior at the Central High School, the second to Harry Klein Roth, of the Junior class, while honorable mention was given to Karl W. Hawk, Sophomore of the same school. The other contestants were as follows: Henry S. Bloomingdale, David H. Cohen, Harvey Shelly Horshour, Arthur Keller, Harry Morrison, Louis A. Rehfuess, William Richards, William M. Robinson, William Dayton Shelly, and George Weimar.

for decided action toward the limitation of armaments, which have enormously increased since 1899, and the Government of the United States is urged to instruct its delegates to support the proposition of the British Government, to have the subject considered by the conference.

"Resolved, That the Congress highly appreciates the eminent services of President Roosevelt in exercising his good offices for restoring peace between Russia and Japan, in preventing, in co-operation with Mexico, a threatened war in Central America, and in initiating the assembling of a second international peace conference at The Hague.

"Resolved, That the distinguished services of the Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary of State, to the cause of international peace be accorded grateful recognition.

"Resolved, That we thank the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, for the noble stand he has taken in favor of a settled policy of peace and of limitation and reduction of military and naval burdens."

WHEN DINNER COMES

ONE OUGHT TO HAVE A GOOD APPETITE.

A good appetite is the best sauce. It goes a long way toward helping in the digestive process, and that is absolutely essential to health and strength.

Many persons have found that Grape-Nuts food is not only nourishing, but is a great appetizer. Even children like the taste of it and grow strong and rosy from its use.

It is especially the food to make a weak stomach strong and create an appetite for dinner.

"I am fifty-seven years old," writes a Tennessee grandmother, "and have had a weak stomach from childhood. By great care as to my diet, I enjoyed a reasonable degree of health, but never found anything to equal Grape-Nuts as a standby.

"When I have no appetite for breakfast, and just eat to keep up my strength, I take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with good, rich milk, and when dinner comes I am hungry. While, if I go without any breakfast I never feel like eating dinner. Grape-Nuts for breakfast seems to make a healthy appetite for dinner.

"My little thirteen-months-old grandson had been very sick with stomach trouble during the past summer, and finally we put him on Grape-Nuts. Now he is growing fat and well. When asked if he wants his nurse or Grape-Nuts, he brightens up and points to the cupboard. He was no trouble to wean at all—thanks to Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. AT LAST.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And, in the winds from unsunned spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown.

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love Divine, O Helper ever present,
Be Thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting;
Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to my own uplifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but Thee, my Father! let Thy spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through Thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place.

Some humble door among Thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows for ever through heaven's green expansions
The river of Thy peace.

There, from the music round about me stealing,
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find at last, beneath Thy trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

Events and Comments.

The Pennsylvania Legislature has passed a law granting the trolley lines the privilege of carrying a limited amount of freight. This will no doubt be very advantageous to dairy and truck farmers. If the plan proves successful and becomes general throughout the country, it may introduce a new system for supplying produce in our large cities.

Anna T. Jeanes, a Philadelphia Friend, has donated $1,000,000 for an endowment fund for educating Southern negro children. The fund is placed at the disposal of a Board, and is to be known as "the fund for rudimentary schools for Southern negroes." This is the largest single gift for public elementary school purposes ever donated by any philanthropist in this country.

John D. Rockefeller has deeded land valued at $2,000,000 to the University of Chicago. This tract adjoins property held by the University, and gives the institution a frontage on midway solid for three-quarters of a mile. John D. Rockefeller has been four years purchasing the lots comprised in the tract, the last one being secured within a month. This gift is the third largest he has made to the University, and increases the total amount of his gifts to the school in the last sixteen months to $6,367,000.

According to late figures from the Government, sugar consumption in the United States is steadily increasing. The total quantity of sugar brought into the country in the nine months ending with Third month, 1907, was 3,692,000,000 pounds; while the United States, according to the best estimates, produced 1,304,000,000 pounds within its own boundaries. This gives us an average of about 76 pounds per annum for each individual. In mere tonnage the sugar brought into our country exceeds by far that of any other article imported. It might be well for our people to consider what is likely to be the effect of a diet largely made up of sugar.

The women teachers in New York

City have been making a vigorous campaign for higher wages. Their slogan has been "Equal pay for like work with men teachers." The fight has been taken to the State Legislature, and there sustained by an overwhelming majority. The measure is likely to be vetoed by the Mayor of New York; but we are informed that the Legislature will probably pass it over his veto. There is considerable difference of opinion with regard to the outcome of the measure. Professor Seligman, of Columbia University, one of the best economic students in the country, is of the opinion that it will be detrimental to the women teachers, since they will gradually be replaced in the upper grades by men teachers; and only in the primary grades where women teachers are especially fitted for the work will they be employed.

The Pennsylvania capitol inquiry has assumed new interest—not because the revelations of graft are any more startling than they have been—that phase of the inquiry is unsurpassed—but the commission is now endeavoring to gather criminal evidence in order to compel the grafters to suffer for their misdeeds, and it is meeting with endless difficulty. The politicians of the State are determined to thwart this undertaking; even members of the commission itself seem to be in sympathy with those involved. No one cared very much as long as the commission simply devoted itself to the revelation of graft. In fact, many of our professional politicians treat such things as jokes, and think the more of themselves because of the publicity which their cunning received through an investigation, but they are not willing to have the crime fixed.

The Jamestown Exposition was formally opened last week by President Roosevelt. The special feature of the occasion was the noise made by the firing of guns from a large number of battle-ships. Thirty-eight American and twelve foreign ships were in the review. In his speech the President incidentally referred to the need for greater military equipment. He is determined not to get away from the idea that fear is a necessary element for governing a people; but, we are happy to say, he did not dwell upon this subject. He devoted most of his time to discussing the control of corporate interests. To use his own words: "This is an era of combination alike in the world of capital and in the world of labor. Each kind of combination can do good, and yet each, however powerful, must be opposed when it does ill. At the moment the greatest problem before us is how to exercise such control over the business use of vast wealth, individual, but especially corporate, as will insure its not being used against the interest of the public, while yet permitting such ample legitimate profits as will encourage individual initiative."

He concluded: "Above all, we insist that while facing changed conditions and new problems, we must face them in the spirit which our forefathers showed when they founded and preserved this Republic. The corner-stone of the Republic lies in our treating each man on his worth as a man, paying no heed to his creed, his birthplace, or his occupation, asking not whether he is rich or poor, whether he labors with head or hand; asking only whether he acts decently and honorably in the various relations of his life, whether he behaves well to his family, to his neighbors, to the State. We base our regard for each man on the essentials and not the accidents. We judge him not by his profession, but by his deeds; by his conduct, not by what he has acquired of this world's goods. Other Republics have fallen, because the citizens gradually grew to consider the interests of a class before the interests of the whole; for when such was the case it mattered little whether it was the poor who plundered the rich or the rich who exploited the poor; in either event the end of the Republic was at hand. We are resolute in our purpose not to fall into such a pit. This great Republic of ours shall never become the government of a plutocracy, and it shall never become the government of a mob. God willing, it shall remain what our fathers who founded it meant it to be—a government in which each man stands on his worth as a man, where each is given the largest personal liberty consistent with securing the well-being of the whole, and where, so far as in us lies, we strive continually to secure for each man such equality of opportunity that in the strife of life he may have a fair chance to show the stuff that is in him. We are proud of our schools and of the trained intelligence they give our children the opportunity to acquire. But what we care for most is the character of the average man; for we believe that if the average of character in the individual citizen is sufficiently high, if he possesses those qualities which make him worthy of respect in his family life and in his work outside, as well as the qualities which fit him for success in the hard struggle of actual existence—that if such is the character of our individual citizenship, there is literally no height of triumph unattainable in this vast experiment of government by, of and for a free people."

NOTICES.

The eighth annual meeting of the Friends' Educational Association will be held at Haverford College, Fifth-month 4, 1907. The main address of the afternoon session at 3 o'clock will be given by Robert Ellis Thompson, of the Central High School, Philadelphia, on the subject, "The Individuality of the Student Developed by Education;" that of the evening, at 7.30 o'clock, by Dr. Paul H. Hanus, Harvard, on "General Principles of Education." All interested are cordially invited.

Friends' Freedmen's Association is preparing to send boxes of clothing, shoes, etc., to their Industrial School at Christiansburg. Those who were present at the annual meeting heard the plea that the treasurer made for active, interested assistance. Excellent use is made of all that is sent, and we have no more worthy recipients of our aid. It is hoped that friends will respond liberally. All packages should be at Friends' Institute, 20 South Twelfth Street, not later than Fifth month 14th, plainly marked "For Christiansburg."

THE SPIRIT OF FELLOWSHIP.

A Friend has asked me how the wall which exists between the "members of the meeting" and the rest of the community can be broken down. It is such an important question that I am going to answer it publicly, instead of privately, for there are many Quaker communities where the middle wall of partition does exist, where there are two "watertight compartments"—the members of the meeting, on the one hand, and the people of the world on the other hand. "How can this wall be broken down?" asks my friend.

It cannot be "broken down;" it must be melted down. There is a pretty story of a little girl who drew a picture on her slate. On half the slate she had a lovely garden, full of flowers and birds and trees. Then came a great wall beyond which she drew a forlorn-looking desert country, with no flowers or trees. Suddenly she began to rub out the wall. Then she made streams run down into the desert region, and she drew flowers and trees there also. Her father asked her what the picture was about. "Oh," she said, "this garden is where the 'happy people' live, and there was a great wall which separated them from the desert, where the 'unhappy people' lived. But the wall was only a snow wall, and the 'happy people' thought kind thoughts of the 'unhappy people,' and that melted the wall and made streams go down into the desert, so that flowers bloomed there, too, and now the 'unhappy people' are 'happy people!'"

The little girl's picture is a true parable. There is only one way of bringing the church into contact with those who most need its influence, and that is for the members of the church to melt down the wall with love and to carry the streams of human sympathy and fellowship out into the lives of the people who do not belong to the church.

The most perfect illustration in the world is the one given in the New Testament. The Pharisees devoted themselves to building compartments. They divided society up into two exclusive groups. They were "the peculiar people of the Lord"—all others were "outcasts." They were "righteous"—all others were "publicans and sinners." When they prayed, they loudly thanked God that they were not like other men. They expected the "Messiah" to come and glorify their group, and destroy utterly the other group. Well, the Messiah-Saviour came and He put Himself at once in the other group! He told the "peculiar people" that He did not come to save those who were "perfect," but that all His interests were toward the outcasts, the sinners, the lost sheep. The "peculiar people" dragged a woman before Him and told Him that the law decreed that "such a woman" should be stoned to death—He said to her, "I do not condemn thee, go try again." I like to think that this was the woman who came to Simon's feast and washed His feet with tears because "she loved much."

His whole method was one of love and sympathy, of intercourse and fellowship with the "sinner class." He made them feel that He loved them rather than condemned them, and He melted down the wall by the warmth of His genuine fellowship with them. The "peculiar people" drew their skirts close about them and denounced the Saviour, because He flocked with publicans and sinners and ate with them.

"His way" is the way for us to-day. Where the wall exists, it will be found that the church has been cultivating the exclusive, judging spirit. It has been condemning, rather than loving, the other section of the neighborhood; it has been preaching against them, rather than getting into living, helpful touch and contact with them. Men are not driven into the kingdom; they are drawn in. They grow hard under condemnation; they soften under the touch of genuine fellowship.

As much as possible, members of the church should share in the neighborhood activities with the non-church members, and cultivate common interests with them. There are many harmless activities in which all can join, and in such intercourse the whole tone of the recreations of the neighborhood can be raised. Few things have proved more cementing and effective than the common meal eaten together. This was Christ's "way," and it was the "way" of the primitive church. Every meeting-house should have a supper-room, where members and attenders can come together as a family for increasing the social bond; and little by little the circle should widen to bring into the group such neighbors as would appreciate and enjoy the fellowship. These supper-meetings—"tea-meetings," we call them in Philadelphia—should combine the social and the instructive aspect. The paper, or address, or discussion, which comes after the supper, should be interesting for all kinds of persons, and should tend toward deepening an interest in the chief business of a Christian church. There are no walls which cannot be melted by the warmth and power of a genuine spirit of fellowship. Try it!

AS OTHERS SEE US.

Seldom has the secular press published anything that displays a truer appreciation of the spirit of Quakerism than the editorial, which appeared in the North American during the recent Philadelphia Yearly meeting. The writer betrays an intimate knowledge of the Discipline, and a clear conception of Friendly ideals. He does not ignore defects, but frankly faces the situation among Friends as he sees it. "To find fault with them," he says, "is not difficult; perfection is not their privilege; faults and failings and short-comings they have in common with other men"—but this candid recognition of faults lends value to his favorable comment.

His review of the Friendly attitude toward Peace is the keenest and best criticism of the situation that has come to our notice from one outside the Society.

It was a pleasing coincidence which arranged the Friends' Yearly Meeting and the New York Peace Conference for the same week. The pity of it is that none of the wise men who spoke in New York recognized the interesting and impressive fact that the Peace Conference is only a couple of hundred years behind the Society of Friends.

This outcry against the iniquity of war, this vehement protest from men of all nations and creeds against the murder of men by governmental authority, were made long centuries ago by the men who framed the organization which met in the old meeting-house in Philadelphia.

The testimony of the Quakers against war has been offered tens of thousands of times in all the possible forms of speech and action, and never has a word of it been retracted under pressure from ridicule, reproach or persecution. The Quaker has always declared the thing to be wrong in theory and in action and its fruitions of glory a mockery of the principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

What is happening now is simply this: the civilized world, sick of bloodshed and international hatred and of all the crimes of war, has turned its face toward the light, and is beginning to move up to the Quaker position.

The Quaker has not moved nor changed his fundamental creeds. He has stood still, in quietest fashion, exerting the influence of a steadfast example. He was magnificently right upon the question from the first, and the time seems to be drawing near when other men, because of one influence or another, will admit the fact and make his theory the world's practice.

From this more or less concrete practical subject he carries his review of the Quakerly method to the spiritual aspect of their message.

Is it not the same with some other matters? Long ago the Quaker proclaimed his faith that religion is absolutely and solely a spiritual thing. Some men think he went too far in throwing overboard, with gaudy forms and picturesque ceremonies, the physical things which seem to express spiritual truth.

But in our time, surely, the spiritual aspects of religion, more than at any preceding period, are recognized as alone important. And, just in proportion as that conviction grows within the churches, and finds voice from the pulpit, so the churches come near to the high standards of the meeting-house, and the long protest of the faithful Friends has justification and reward.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The people of Oklahoma and Indian Territories are to vote the adoption of the constitution drafted by the recent convention the 6th of Eighth month. At that time they are also to decide whether or not the new State shall have constitutional prohibition, this part of the constitution being voted upon separately. The fight is now on. Oklahoma is a rich harvest field for the saloonists, and the Indian reservations with their people, the richest in the world, and many of them an easy prey to drink, are special eldorados for the liquor men. They are doing all they can to defeat the prohibitory measure. The Anti-Saloon League and other temperance unions are organizing their forces in its behalf and putting their best men in the field. Christian people from all sections of the country should give them hearty and substantial support. Victory is ours if we work, and we cannot afford to lose. Money sent to Foster Cadeland, treasurer of the American Anti-Saloon League, 610 New Haven Building, Columbus, Ohio, will be well used.

We note with sad regret the death of our friend, John Stephenson Rowntree, York, England. He has for many years been a powerful minister of the Gospel, and he has taken a prominent part in shaping the onward course of Quakerism in England. He has done more than any other present day Friend to revive the study of Quaker history. In 1859, he won a hundred guineas ($500) prize for the best essay on the "Causes of the Decline of Quakerism," and the little book, made from this essay, under title, "Quakerism, Past and Present," is still a very valuable book. His pamphlet, entitled "Micah's Mother," is one of the most admirable pieces of historical work that any Friend has produced. Three of his valuable historical papers are published in "Echoes from the Scarborough Summer School." His last important book was, "The Society of Friends—Its Faith and Practice." His love of history had powerful influence on his nephew, John Wilhelm Rowntree, and his broad-minded outlook for our Society has been an inspiration to all the younger men who knew him. His public service in his own city was very great, and his beautiful spirit of sweetness and light is a permanent legacy.

The death of Peace Jones, which occurred on the 20th inst., has removed the oldest and one of the most effective ministers of New England Yearly Meeting. She was in her ninety-third year, and for more than half of this long life she was a devoted minister of the Gospel. She traveled extensively, many times covering her own yearly meeting, and visiting besides in the limits of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, North Carolina, Ohio and Iowa Yearly Meetings. Her influence in her own meeting was very great, and her beautiful spiritual life, breathing love and grace, has drawn many into closer fellowship with the Christ whom she served.

The need in our modern society for Christian talks, Bible readings and the like, given by business men to others of their fellows, is clearly manifest by the success attending such efforts of Y. M. C. A. and kindred organizations. In this connection a recent editorial comment in The Congregationalist on lay preaching is interesting:

We need as a denomination to seek men with gifts as lay preachers, to encourage, open ways for and guide their service. Lay preaching has made large gain among Congregationalists in England within the last four or five years. It is often the main reliance for Christian work in rural districts. Efforts to train persons for such service by American Congregationalists have thus far been inadequate. The layman who has had a short course of training and gets any recognition as a preacher usually pushes for a pulpit where he can get a living without other work. Our influence in this respect has not been wholly beneficial to other denominations. Methodist Protestants, with whom we are negotiating union, and men in other bodies have sometimes said that they have appointed men to small rural charges, giving them perhaps $200 per year, which has supplemented their income from the farm or the shop. But in several instances where such men have proved efficient, a neighboring Congregational church has offered them $500 or $600, and secured them, with loss to the other denomination and no advantage to the community. We need a better system for cultivating lay talent.

THE INTERPRETATION AND USE OF THE BIBLE.

BY ELBERT RUSSELL.

XV. THE HISTORICAL BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

The so-called historical books extend from Genesis to Esther in the Old Testament, and from Matthew to Acts, in the New. They form about five-ninths of the bulk of the Old Testament, and about four-sevenths of the New. As the books stand in the Old Testament, they form two separate narratives; in the books from Genesis to Second Kings there is a fairly continuous history of Israel from the beginning of the world, according to Jewish tradition, down to the fall of Jerusalem. In the books of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, the same ground is covered by genealogies down to the time of David, after which the history of the Hebrew people is re-written from the standpoint of the temple-worship and carried down to the time of the work of Ezra and Nehemiah. In the narratives of the books from Judges to Second Kings, the religious point of view is that of the prophets, while in Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah it is that of the priests. In the Pentateuch and Joshua narratives representing both standpoints are interwoven.

The style of these Old Testament narratives varies greatly. It includes bare genealogies, brief annal-like chronicles of the doings of kings, plain narratives of historic fact, vivid stories, and songs of blessing or victory.

In the New Testament the narrative books include the four Gospels, with their accounts of the doings and saying of Jesus' public ministry, and the book of Acts, which gives an account of the expansion of Christianity in Jerusalem and Syria, and then follows the work of Paul till his arrival in Rome. The style of these books is much more uniform, but even here the prose narrative style is broken by an occasional genealogy or song in the Gospels, as well as by the multiform sayings of Jesus, and by the speeches of the apostles recorded in the Acts.

If we ask where the writers of these books got their information, we find that here and there only is there a hint or statement of the answer. It was not the custom of ancient writers to cite authorities or give a bibliography. The writers of Kings and Chronicles refer the reader to certain royal and prophetic books in which the rest of the information, which they have not copied, may be found. Such are "the book of the acts of Solomon" (I Kings 11:41), the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (I Kings 14:29); and the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel" (I Kings 14:19); and the books of certain prophets and seers (I Chron. 29:29; II Chron. 9:29; 32:32). A comparison of II Kings 18-20, with Isaiah 36-39, and of II Kings 25, with Jeremiah 40-42, 52, shows that the writer of Kings used the books of Isaiah and Jeremiah as sources.

Two of Israel's earliest books appear to have been collections of songs. "The book of the wars of Jehovah" is quoted in Num. 21:14. Possibly the song of Moses and Miriam (Ex. 15), and the triumphal ode of Deborah and Barak (Judg. 5), are from the same source. "The book of Jashar" is quoted in Joshua 10:12, 13 and II Sam. 1:17:27. A passage in the Septuagint translation seems to mean that the prayer of Solomon (I Kings 8) was taken from the same book. Long before the narrative books were completed, the traditions of the patriarchs, which had been told from father to son, the stories of the prophets, which had been kept in the schools of the prophets (Cf. II Kings 8:4), the songs of Israel's early history (Cf. Num. 21:27), and the priestly instructions which were given orally to inquirers as late as Haggai's time (Hag. 2:11) had been written down and were used as sources by the compilers of these books.

In the New Testament, Luke alone gives us an account of the process of gathering the information in his book. In the preface to the Gospel (Lk. 1:1-4), he tells us that before he wrote many had attempted to put the apostolic testimony into written form. Because these narratives were either incomplete or inaccurate, he attempted to do the work more systematically and accurately. Apparently he used the existing narratives as a basis of his work, but verified and added to them as best he could from reliable witnesses. The so-called "we"-sections of Acts show that part of the book rests on the account of a companion of Paul in some of his journeys (Acts 16:16 and passim).

What estimate shall we put on the historical value of these books? The answer must be that their historical value varies with the sources and with the manner in which the writer has used his material; but in the main they represent the course of events with general accuracy. Efforts were made by some historical scholars some half century ago to prove that these narratives were almost wholly untrustworthy as history, but discoveries in the last few decades have steadily tended to confirm the general historical accuracy of these books, both in the Old and New Testaments. The recently discovered monument of Hammurabi (Amraphel) has given an interesting, if somewhat distant, confirmation of Genesis 14. The store-cities of Rameses (mentioned in Ex. 1:11; 5:10-21), on the border of Egypt, have been excavated, showing still the upper courses of brick without straw. The Moabite Stone gives Mesha's own account of his rebellion against Israel (2 Kgs. 3:4, 5). Shishak's account of his invasion of Palestine is found on the walls of the temple of Karnak (I Kgs. 14:25). The monuments of Babylonia and Assyria confirm the Biblical accounts of the captivity of Galilee under Tiglath-pileser, the capture of Samaria, Sennacherib's invasion of Judah, the intrigues of Egypt in Palestine, the capture of Babylon by Cyrus, and his permission to the Jews to return to their own land. The Assyrian chronology clears up many vexed problems in the chronology of the Book of Kings, and, while correcting some misapprehensions, shows the general correctness of the chronology of the book. In a similar, but less spectacular, way literary discoveries, and studies and explorations in Asia Minor, have put the historical value of the Gospels and Acts in general beyond dispute.

The importance of this fact is great. The revelation in the Bible was made through and tested by a long historic experience. The reflections of the Wise Men were based on it; the messages of the prophets are conditioned by it, and it furnishes the occasion and most of the subject matter of the epistles. No sacred book of another religion furnishes any parallel to it. The Koran and Vedas are almost wholly speculation, ritual, or laws. These facts give us a good ground of assurance that the truths of the Bible, having been revealed through human religious experience, will be found true when tested in experience so long as human nature and its needs remain essentially the same.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE SIMPLE GOSPEL.

BY LIZZIE BRADSHAW.

This is a day in which, it is said, denominational prejudice is fast giving way, and we should expect to find differences in our own church swallowed up in growing Christian brotherhood. Yet, how different are the explanations given by well-meaning individuals among our people, of the way to get into fellowship with Christ, the coming of His spirit into our hearts, and the life acceptable in His sight.

Let those who will, harp on certain set rules by which a human should come into the fold, and try to shape their experiences by them; but to me, the safest guide would seem the testimony of those who truly know God as to how He has revealed Himself to them. May those who feel His blessed Spirit ruling in their hearts never waver because some may preach a doctrine contradicting the way in which it was received. How glorious it would be if we could rid ourselves of prejudice for certain terms and formalities, and behold the Gospel in the beauty of simplicity!

When Jesus, the Son of God, walked the earth in the form of man, He talked and reasoned in the language of men, both with sinner and saint, with Gentile and Jew. But when the time came for Him to return unto His Father, He needs must send His Spirit, only another form of Himself, to communicate with men, which also was to work upon the hearts of all men, the saved and the unsaved. To the sinner, it is God's voice pleading for admission, for recognition. To the Christian, it is God's spirit admitted, enthroned, and directing all his walks of life. This crossing over from the Spirit debarred to the Spirit received, marks the change from the worldly, self-seeking man to the redeemed Christ-like one. "If ye have not His spirit, ye are none of His."

The essential thing is the belief in and the acceptance of God's truth and light, through the instrument of the Spirit, representing God Himself. Hence difference in methods should not cause any contention, or denunciation of our neighbor. Should we not leave the narrow ideas, held in earlier days, of exclusiveness, prejudice, and persecution, and recognize that the blessed Saviour binds all mankind in one brotherhood, manifesting Himself in different ways, but implanting within the hearts of all His children that one all conquering power, "love?"

Haviland, Kan.

THE LAY MINISTRY.*

BY JOHN WILHELM ROWNTREE.

I think we shall all recognize that the question of the vocal ministry cannot be adequately considered in a water-tight compartment, for it must be the expression of the man in his entirety—of his attitude towards God and his fellows, of all he knows of God in the universe, and of the human heart, of sin and death, of love and life.

Imperfections of character, flaws in the thousand relations between the soul and its environment, mar or limit the message, however true and fitting the spoken words.

Accepting this view, let us consider certain points affecting the personal element in the minister's vocation.

First of these I would place Vision.

We must ride with Paul to Damascus. We must see and know God in Christ, and life as He interprets it for us. We may have been of the strictest sect of the Pharisees and yet have kicked for years against the goad. The vision will reveal this secret of the heart, and teach us our need of a renewal, that all creation must have a new smell, and the harmony of love overcome the dissonance of self-hood.

Second, Consecration.

The heavenly vision calls for obedience. We have encountered a great light which has interpreted to us at once our true self, and the love and passion of the Cross. This is our summons, and our answer must be service.

But many mistake the meaning of consecration. They think that as consecration is the offering of our faculties to God, so all the responsibility for using them is His. This is the fallacy which has so often lurked in the teaching of the Inner Light. Consecration means the concentration of the energies of mind and soul upon their improvement for service. It is a frank recognition that God's work of redemption is a co-operative work, demanding the agency of man for its completion. To be spiritual is not to be slipshod. Consecration, therefore, includes the disciplined training of the mind, the right apportionment of time, the careful selection of our reading towards a definite end. It means what the permanent settlement of Woodbrooke means, the combined potency of prayer and of thought.

Third, Sympathy.

We must sit where the people sit. Here I am afraid we often fail. We are most of us bundles of prejudice, theological, social, political. And yet sympathy, spiritual and intellectual, is all important. We must try fairly to understand the social condition, and the intellectual atmosphere, of the person we would help. We must know something of the current thoughts of the day, not polemically, but sympathetically. The man who tilts his theological lance, tipped with the venom of controversy, at modern thought, or the higher critics, or the revival preacher, is not helping, but retarding, the coming of God's kingdom.

And perhaps the best training-school in which sympathy may be learned as a lesson is the pastoral. One great weakness of Quaker ministry is its frequent dissociation from pastoral work and care. Remember that the magnetism of a messenger lies in his sympathy, and sympathy is born of knowledge.

Fourth, Humility.

Pride in a gift is its destruction. The office of minister is one not of supremacy, but of service. No thought of self should deflect the inward eye from the end and purpose of God—the redemption of man.

"Did I speak well?" "What do people say of me?" "Were people pleased?" These may be the thoughts of personal vanity, and go not seldom with that resentment of criticism which is the testimony to spiritual unfitness. The most victorious quality of the minister of God is his humility.

Fifth, Courage.

These days of invertebrate thinking and luxurious pleasures demand courageous speaking. It is a long time since Sydney Smith startled his congregation of judges and lawyers in York Minster, by declaiming "Woe unto you lawyers!" The frank condemnation of social sins and intellectual errors, uttered in scorn of opinion but in the spirit of love, is too rare in the Christian ministry.

There is no more frequent taunt flung at the preacher than the taunt of cowardice and evasion, and in measure I fear it is just. We are too frightened of uttering our true thoughts. In chapel and meeting-house a mischievous tradition of religious phraseology has grown up, which destroys the freshness and directness of the preaching, and which it requires some courage to disregard. As Sir Edward Fry in his essay on sermons, has remarked, "the ordinary preacher is afraid to call a spade a spade; he would rather describe it as 'that instrument of agriculture with which our first father labored when, by the providence of God, he was called on to till the garden of Eden.'" We need, I think, to imitate John Woolman, who combined the sweetness of true humility with an unconquerable courage.

Sixth, Variety.

It is a bad symptom when, after the first few words of a sermon, the congregation remarks to itself mentally, "Oh, I know what's coming now!" And yet how often this is true. The prepared or unprepared sermon falls alike under this condemnation. Indeed, the prepared sermon, when it is machine-made, is often the most at fault.

We want the imagination which springs from sympathy, and the freshness which springs from thought. We must bring all things into the treasury. It is often said, "Oh, the simple Gospel is all we need," but that depends upon what is meant. To deal in the obvious, because thinking is too much trouble, is to offer unconsecrated ministry. We want rather that variety of presentation which does not obscure or replace the Gospel, but which saves us from the dead monotony of repetition.

I know of a minister who keeps a pocket-book. If a thought strikes him, whether reading or in reverie, if he notices a telling sentence, passage or illustration, he makes a note or copy of it. When the pocket-book is full the contents are transferred to a commonplace-book properly indexed according to subjects, and are constantly available for reference. This is surely an excellent example of that proper discipline which should govern the life of the preacher, and a wise recognition of the efficacy of human forethought, which nowise destroys the liberty of the Spirit.

Seventh, Diligence and Patience.

Diligence in the face of apparent unresponsiveness, and in labor that seems fruitless—patience that means sustained interest, even if utterance be infrequent.

We cannot serve any cause haphazard. It is the belief of some that, because the Spirit bloweth where it listeth, a succession of evanescent “concerns” for the meeting and the Society must be more spiritual than a continuous exercise of heart and mind. But God does not work spasmodically. He works continuously. There are, indeed, times when the Divine power is more richly manifest than at others, but there is no real pause in the work of God. We need more consecrated, sustained and penetrating thought, directed not only to the vocal ministry, but to all Christian service, and it will be out of such patience that the most enduring work will grow.

Eighth, Sacrifice.

Our considerations, and many others which we have not space to mention, must receive the endorsement of sacrifice. Without this none are valid. No scheme can evade the necessity, none offer a substitute for this vital quality of all true labor. But self-sacrifice must take a definite and practical form: it must take cognizance of the needs and conditions of service. In the past, Quakerism has leaned upon an inadequate conception of the Inner Light. It has unduly depressed the exercise and diminished the place of the reasoning faculties. It has forgotten that the direct revelation of God’s will is not fully effective apart from the fitness of the instrument to receive or act upon it—or rather it has regarded such fitness in too narrow a sense, and shunned, whether from mistaken interpretation or fleshly weakness, that needful discipline of the mind which supports, directs, and renders more efficacious the no less needful labor of the soul.

While Quakerism, with its just emphasis upon the inwardness of religion, has been fruitful of saints and rich in the practical mercy of its wide philanthropy, it has been singularly weak in its constructive thought. The brief promise of its early days has been disappointed, and the ministry which swept England from end to end, so far from conquering the world, has proved impotent to save even the Quaker fellowship from decay.

We are willing now to face the facts, and refuse any longer to be lulled by the siren praises of those who admire the Quakers for what they once were. We must live in the present and think of the future. The call is coming to us again as it came to Fox, as urgent, as exacting, as loud.

All is not well with the world. The belief in force, the love of ease, the lust for sensationalism, the superficiality of emotional or formal religion, the parasitism even of the religious, these are with us in their modern dress, even as they were with Fox in the garb of seventeenth century thought and practice.

The question of the ministry is in part a question of equipment, but it is still a question of spiritual temper. What is our attitude towards life? Do we see things as they really are, or as our contemporaries would have us believe? Do we pierce to the inward motive, the inward fact? Do we refuse to be swayed by prejudice, by the social environment in which we have been reared? Do we dare to cut ourselves loose from convention and speak out the unpalatable truth?

Without vision we shall perish, without sacrifice the vision will glow and fade, an unavailing dream.

There is one aspect of the question before us upon which I can only touch. It has been asked, Can laymen, especially those faithful to the manifold duties of citizenship, under the necessity of working for their living, meet, in any adequate measure, the exacting demands of the ministry of the Word?

Let it be acknowledged that the problem of the Free Ministry is not only a spiritual, but also a practical problem. We have it yet to solve. There are needs of the human heart which are not met by prophecy and exhortation, but by teaching, and the ministry of teaching demands a trained and ordered mind. We must tackle this difficulty honestly and bravely, and so long as we compromise nothing of our message and testimony we must not shrink from properly safe-guarded measures, which will grant to those who feel the call the means of fulfilling their service. Nor must we in any case hesitate to recognize the diversity of gifts, and the place and function of the vocal ministry in the economy of the Church.

But, again, nothing can avail without sacrifice, neither silence nor ministry, organization nor equipment.

The message of the Inner Life, which is the message of Quakerism, is strenuous, and embraces the whole energies of the soul. But we cannot call men back to the verities of the Spirit unless we ourselves have won them and possess them.

These must be won in worship. The strength of a Quaker meeting lies in its truth of spiritual apprehension, and in the reality and earnestness of individual exercise. Let all ministry be to this end, seeking as its definite aim the conversion of men from the love of self to the love of God in Christ, from the torpor of indulgence to the passion and the glory of service.

THE PEACE CONGRESS.

AS SEEN BY ONE OF THE PEOPLE.

Some of us whose inheritance was a birthright membership in the Society of Friends, and who claim a healthy interest in the various branches of the work of the Society, have yet found it difficult to be really interested in a peace meeting.

And we remember vividly when, as young people, with an interest that was alive and sustained in all other sessions of the yearly meeting, we invariably looked for some way to evade the dull, dry peace sessions. In consequence, perhaps, of these youthful impressions, we have always thought very tamely of the peace movement.

We believed the movement ought to be interesting and effective, but we were unable even to suggest how it might be made so and we generally occupied ourselves with something of acknowledged interest. But the late International Peace Congress, held in New York, fully redeemed the peace movement and quickened even ourselves to an enthusiastic interest. We did not have any of that old-time feeling that the Society stood for peace, and must therefore have a peace meeting.

The workers of this Peace Congress impressed us at once, as men and women of affairs, who had world interests and who saw and felt that there was a great deal of evil in the world which might be stopped, and they proceeded to consider the wisest methods for the cessation of this unnecessary evil—methods which would accomplish the end by a thoughtful conserving of the highest and best interests of every nation. We could but feel that this was surely an undertaking worth while!

But it was one which would require wise statesmanship as well as heroic devotion to principle. And the days of the Congress proved to us that the peace movement has found its needed statesmen and its heroic devotees.

The first session in Carnegie Hall was a fine prelude to the more strenuous days which followed.

The great hall, with its walls beautifully and fittingly decorated with our own stars and stripes and the flags of many other nations, worked out on a background of pure white, all glowing under the full electric lights, its large platform literally packed with the vast choir and the representative speakers, with the tremendous seating capacity of its auditorium filled to the utmost, made a brilliant picture, which deeply moved one.

At this session some of the great clergymen of our own country welcomed and addressed the Congress. We do not doubt that the addresses were splendid, and we believe that the clergymen are essential to the movement, but we confess that our own personal interest reached a much higher degree of enthusiasm in the second meeting on Monday afternoon, when the men of affairs addressed the people. And the Congress was heartily welcomed and its work endorsed by representative men of our city, State and nation.

There was a thoughtful sincerity back of the noble utterances of these men who serve the public interests, which did our hearts good.

The Tuesday morning session was given to the women; and we confess ourselves as always disappointed in "women's meetings;" we do not favor them; we are glad their day is past in the Society of Friends. The feminine mind needs the atmosphere of the strong, trained masculine intellect when it comes to public speaking.

We always do better work when we all work together.

And apropos of this, we noticed that Jane Addams, who spoke on "New Ideals of Peace" in this woman's session, made a much better address on the same subject before the united Congress in the educational session of Tuesday evening.

All the representatives from foreign countries, excepting possibly William Stead, were most gracious and kindly in their interest and appreciation of our National Government, the enterprise of the people, and the part which the United States contribute to world betterment.

The university meeting, on Tuesday evening, was one of great interest, and will doubtless have a lasting influence to promote world interest in world peace. The universities of our own and other lands were, we believe, made to feel that here was a field for service to mankind, for which the university man is specially fitted.

On Wednesday afternoon, with Seth Low presiding, the Congress considered the legislative and judicial aspects of the peace movement.

The effect of this session was to force still deeper the impression that these peace people are not mere sentimentalists.

Here were our legislators and judges studying, counseling, and earnestly working for world betterment, along lines of international legislation in the interests of peace to all nations.

William Jennings Bryan was the last speaker of this session. He considered the peace movement broadly and very hopefully, and said we ought not to be surprised at seeming inconsistencies. Man never fully realizes his ideal. If he were once able to realize his ideal, it would cease to be an ideal and man would cease to rise. It is the glory of the Christian ideal that while the simplest and humblest may understand and follow it, the highest, the smartest and best must always march steadily on with uplifted face.

So much has been accomplished, we can hope, work and expect the rest to follow. If disputing nations can be induced to allow international investigation and inquiry into the causes of war before they resort to force, a large per cent. of wars will be averted. When man is excited the brute in him rules. When he stops and thinks, reason prevails.

W. J. Bryan said, when he visited the tomb of Napoleon, in France, he had expected in the impressive stillness of death to read Ingersoll's tribute to the great warrior, and had carried the book with him for that purpose. But as he stood in the solemn silence and looked down on the great stone sarcophagus, which held the remains of the dead warrior, his eyes at once rested on a cross, which stood at one end of the tomb. He forgot Ingersoll's tribute and could think only of this, that the great warrior, the astute general, the man of many battles, was sleeping silently at the foot of the Prince of Peace.

And to W. J. Bryan it seemed a fitting type of that future brotherhood of nations, in which wars shall have ceased and every nation shall share the blessed fruits of the reign of the Prince of Peace.

Who had not been charmed in a historic study of the Old Testament by its foreshadowings of the Christ? To catch the message of the prophet as it applied to his day and his nation, and then trace its partial fulfillment in the after developments of history, has a fascinating interest. The world was getting ready for the Prince of Peace.

He has come and left us his message, and now, to-day, as truly as in Isaiah's time, the nations are slowly working out his will. Was not this Peace Congress making practical the sign of this Christ? We left the Congress under a solemn sense of this fact; we felt ourselves really a part of the peace movement after all.

The past, the present, and the future are forever one in the unfoldings of truth and the working out of righteousness and peace on earth.

AMOS SANDERS—AN APPRECIATION.

BY VIOLA B. MARINE.

On March 22, 1907, by a death so sudden that it was like a translation, Amos Sanders was called from earth. He had long dwelt almost at the gate of the other world, first through witnessing and, in spirit, sharing the lingering illness and death of his beloved wife, and then by a baptism himself into suffering such as few men are called upon to bear.

He was born at Valley Mills, Ind., on Fifth month 30, 1845, and almost from infancy attended meeting at Lick Branch, in a little log meeting-house about three miles distant. A large part of his education came through the denominational schools of Friends, where he is said to have been known for his sunny temperament, and the impulse toward right and fairness that characterized him in later life. After a year at Earlham College, and another in teaching, he went, in 1867, to Macon, Miss., to take charge of Friends' work among the freedmen. He remained there in all nearly a dozen years, throughout the perilous days of the Ku Klux Klan. Numerous warnings were sent him to leave the country, several times his house was fired upon, and thrice he was marked for death by bands organized for the purpose, but always escaped. Among the colored people, old and young, who attended these schools, was one Margaret Murray, who, with the earnest desire to continue her studies, for a year cooked in the family to obtain the necessary funds. Of this promising pupil, Amos Sanders lost sight for a number of years, but recently, by a chain of circumstances, discovered her in the wife of Booker T. Washington, and received from her a letter, outlining her life since she left the school in Macon.

In 1879, he came north to enter upon educational work, and was one of the first to win a life certificate in Indiana. He was superintendent of schools in Butlerville and North Vernon, Ind., and in Georgetown, Ill., and principal of Union High School, in Westfield, Ind., and of Blue River Academy. Ever active in religious work throughout these years, in 1890 he felt called to devote himself entirely to the ministry, and was drawn to Noblesville, Ind. Here, from a beginning of 30 people in a small hall, by patient, persistent, believing effort, he and his wife built up a strong meeting, accomplished the erection of a neat and commodious meeting-house and became leaders and examples for the life of the community. Its business and professional men were all his "boys," and people of all classes learned to turn to his home for light, help and sympathy. At no time after his adoption of the calling of pastor did he receive more than half his former income, often not more than a third, but to an almost unexampled degree he had become deaf to the appeals of material advantage, recognizing only one ambition and object—the advance of the cause of Christ and the bettering of his fellows. It was during these years that his efforts were turned to the project of a summer school at Earlham College, which, as the first representative from Western Yearly Meeting, in conjunction with Allen Jay, he saw established in the early nineties.

At the end of ten years, in 1900, Noblesville Meeting reluctantly bade farewell to him and his wife, that they might accept the call from Brooklyn, N. Y.

Here he served faithfully and lovingly for nearly five years, leaving an influence so great that, "being dead, he yet speaketh." As the Master's life expressed to men the love and pity of God, so this man in walk and personality showed forth the grace and tenderness of the great Lover of Souls.

Perhaps the most wonderful lesson of this life was his fidelity under exceeding trial—a picture upon which our eyes dwelt with wonder, and an influence that we shall never outgrow. In his conception of things there was, for a child of God, no such thing as doubt of the Divine goodness, nor repining, nor self-pity. He would not have thought it permitted to himself even to express dissatisfaction with the weather, from his calm belief that it and all things else came directly from the Father's hand. Cheerfulness was with him a test of fealty, and complaint, simple treason to the Kingdom of God. From personal letters, we read such things as these: "Though I had often felt that I should hardly care to live after Mrs. Sanders was gone, I knew little of the suffering that would come into my heart at her departure, but I have learned by the experience of the past few weeks that God is able to so keep the heart that it can rejoice and sing praises in the face of great affliction." And again: "You remember I used to preach to you that one's happiness did not consist in his surroundings or his condition. I guess I am going to be compelled to test my statements. Well, if it will help the world, let it be so. My testimony to-day stands as it stood in theory. Separation, pain and a foreign shore do not change the joy of the heart."

Ah! Verily he was one who "endured hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ."

He came close up to the heart life of his fellows, touching ever but to heal, entering in with ready sympathy whether it be joy or woe, counseling, encouraging, stimulating to good, above all, living ever a life that never, by word, act, or look, fell out of line with the truth he preached. Such was the life of Amos Sanders—not only a fragrant memory to us who loved him, but the most powerful of sermons, an unanswerable argument to doubt, a continual persuasion to better things.

DR. DICIA H. BAKER.

Doctor Dicia Houston Baker, who died in Birmingham, Ala., on the 19th instant, lived such a worthy and successful life that a brief notice of her is sent to THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Doctor Baker was born forty-four years ago in Tennessee, and received her early training there. In 1886, she came to Guilford College, where she spent two years and completed what was then called the academic course. While here, by her faithful devotion to all duty and by the sincerity and genuineness of her life, she made a lasting impression upon the entire community.

Subsequently, she graduated in pharmacy in Vanderbilt University, and later took the doctor's degree from the Laura Memorial Medical College, in Cincinnati. Her success as a doctor in Birmingham, in which city she was at first a total stranger, was phenomenal, and is proof of her ability and skill.

Dr. Baker was an active member of the Society of Friends, and although she late in life united with the Presbyterian Church, this was on account of there being no Friends' meeting which she could attend; and in faith and sympathy she retained her early Quaker spirit.

She was much interested in education and in all work for the elevation of mankind. She contributed in her life time to the education of girls at Guilford College, and in her will remembered the Girls' Aid Committee of North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

Wherever she went she made lasting friends, and her life was far removed from sordid selfishness, and was lived in a sphere of dignified ambition into which she admitted nothing that did not accord with the spirit of Jesus' words: "I came not to be ministered unto but to minister."

LESSON VI.

FIFTH MONTH 12, 1907.

JOSEPH FORGIVES HIS BROTHERS.

Genesis 45: 1-15; 50: 15-21.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you. Eph. 4: 32.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fifth mo. 6.—The famine. Gen. 42: 1-13.
Third-day, Fifth mo. 7.—The second journey. Gen. 43: 1-14.
Fourth-day, Fifth mo. 8.—Joseph forgives his brothers. Gen. 45: 1-15.
Fifth-day, Fifth mo. 9.—Joyful news. Gen. 45: 16-28.
Sixth-day, Fifth mo. 10.—Jacob in Egypt. Gen. 47: 1-10.
Seventh-day, Fifth mo. 11.—Death of Joseph. Gen. 50: 15-21.
First-day, Fifth mo. 12.—Love to enemies. Matt. 5: 38-48.

Time.—Uncertain; possibly about 1625 B. C.

Place.—Probably, Heliopolis (On), near Cairo, about 250 miles from Hebron, though it may have been Zoan (Tanis), near one of the mouths of the Nile.

Monarch.—Possibly Apepa, the last of the important kings of the Hyksos dynasty.

The story of the reunion of Joseph with his family, and their subsequent residence in Egypt, one of the most attractive narratives of Genesis, is found in chapters 42-50. Only a small part is given in the lessons of the year. Chapters 42, 43, 44, should be read, so as to bring freshly to mind the incidents which took place during the visits of Joseph's brethren in Egypt. The pathos of the 44th chapter is most touching. Judah's appeal is certainly unsurpassed.

1. "Could not refrain himself." Compare Gen. 43: 31. His tests had been severe enough to assure him that he could trust his brothers. "To go out." He did not wish any witnesses of the tender scene.

2. "Wept aloud." Tears of joy. "The Egyptian," etc. They were standing outside. "House." Household attendants.

3. "I am Joseph." He spoke doubtless in his old natural manner, and in their own tongue or dialect. He had been possibly disguising his voice and was dressed in Egyptian fashion. "Could not answer him." They were so astonished that they could not speak. "Troubled." Dismayed.

4. "Whom ye sold into Egypt." Perhaps this was rather to identify himself than to reproach them. Besides he wished to make it clear that he forgave them completely.

5. Joseph reassures them. "For God did send me before you to preserve life." He does not intend to condone their crime, but to show that God had not allowed it to work out evil. See also 50:20.

6. "Two years." The famine had yet five years to run. "Neither earing nor harvest." "Earing" is an old word for "plowing," perhaps allied with the Latin root, which appears in the word, "arable."

7. "Preserve you a posterity." "Remnant." R. V. To leave you descendants. "Save your lives by a great deliverance." The meaning is not very clear; the marginal reading is, "to be a great company that escape."

8. Again Joseph dwells on God's providence in regulating events so as to be a blessing instead of a curse. "A father to Pharaoh." A metaphorical use of the word, meaning a wise and kindly adviser and administrator. Compare Is. 22:21. "Lord of all his house." Gen. 41:40.

9. "Haste, ye." Joseph knew that his father was grieving over Benjamin's absence, and Joseph himself was anxious to see his father. "Lord of all Egypt." This would explain why he did not go himself, besides being a source of gratification to the old man.

10. "Land of Goshen." This territory "lay on the eastern border of the Nile Delta, and furnished excellent pasture. It evidently lay on the Syrian frontier (Gen. 46:28)." It is described as "the best of the land." Gen. 47:6. The patriarch's household was pastoral, and so the district was in every way specially suited to them. "Thou." Jacob. His children and grandchildren should be near Joseph, whose position would enable him to be their protector. Compare Ex. 1:8.

12. "Your eyes see," etc. Knowing that Jacob would doubt the story, he calls upon them, and especially Benjamin, his own brother, to satisfy themselves that he really was Joseph.

13. Joseph mentions other things that would convince his father and make his brothers more ready to tell their father the whole story of their crime, and how it had been overruled for good.

(The chapters omitted should be read.) 50:15. "Their father was dead." As long as their father lived they felt perfectly safe, but when he died, they judged Joseph by themselves, and feared that he would requite the evil which they had done so long before.

16, 17. They did not dare to go in person, but sent, begging his forgiveness, and maintaining that it was their father's request made before he died.

"Trespass." Better as in R. V. "transgression." "The servants of the God of thy father." This was to remind Joseph that they were worshippers of the same God as he and their father. "When they spoke." When he received their message.

18. The brothers next appear in person before Joseph, in humility.

19. "Am I in the place of God?" That is to inflict retribution upon you.

20, 21. He again reassures them by saying that God had overruled what they had done, and promises them protection.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. It is a blessed thing that God so often overrules our mistakes, and sins.

2. "Forgiveness is man's deepest need and highest achievement."

3. Romans 8:28.

TOPIC FOR FIFTH MONTH TWELFTH, 1907.

LESSONS FROM THE PATRIARCHS.

IV. JOSEPH.

Ps. 105:16-24.

Second-day, Fifth mo. 6.—Loved and envied. Gen. 37:3-36.
Third-day, Fifth mo. 7.—A good servant. Gen. 39:1-6.
Fourth-day, Fifth mo. 8.—Helpful in prison. Gen. 39:20; 40:22.
Fifth-day, Fifth mo. 9.—Wiser than kings. Gen. 41:14-26.
Sixth-day, Fifth mo. 10.—Forgiving. Gen. 45:1-15.
Seventh-day, Fifth mo. 11.—Believing the promise. Gen. 50:15-26.

Joseph's biographer traces his life from the time of his obedient youth to his devout and trustful old age, and almost uniformly the character presented commands our admiration and respect. Possibly, he was a little exultant as he related the dreams foretelling his dominance over his brethren, and possibly, too, he was over-ready to report his brothers' evil conduct. Yet it may all have been done from a sense of duty, and the latter was perhaps an actual carrying out of his father's directions, as when he went cheerfully and bravely to the herdsmen's camp at Dothan. No sense of ill-will or bad faith bred fear in his mind, as had been the case with his father when about to meet Esau.

His nature was not able to comprehend the cold-bloodedness of his brothers, who could sit down and eat perhaps the very food he had brought them while his pleadings and cries were ringing in their ears. But forgiveness grew somewhere in the root from which sprang an Esau and a Joseph, and overwhelming tenderness made the ruler of Egypt go out to weep, as he saw, after so many years, the "lad," Benjamin, gathered before him with his brothers. Unembittered by the falsity of the charges on which he was imprisoned, and grieved that his brothers could think of a cherished purpose of revenge after their father's death, he was in all his life an exemplar of the love that "suffereth long and is kind."

The unfailing readiness with which Joseph adapted himself to the conditions of his life is something to emulate. His father's obedient and trusted messenger, Potiphar's faithful slave, steward and overseer of the prison, though himself a prisoner, ruler of all Egypt, with vigor and integrity, he was always at the fore—not only by scheming and plotting, but with no one to prosper his fortunes but God and his own efforts. Some native quality of leadership he was doubtless endowed with; so were Cæsar and Napoleon; but how absolutely different were the dominating purposes of their lives from his!

Joseph seems to have been the first to realize that the promised Hebrew nation was already in existence, and his faith foresaw its return to the land of his fathers, while his strong, religious fervor inspired the request that his bones be not left to lie in an alien soil, but that they be buried in the land that God "swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob;" and so he won for himself a place on the roll of faith's heroes.

Missionary Department.

[Communications for this department should be addressed to The Editor, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.]

F. A. I. M. BOARD ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Board of the Friends' African Industrial Mission occurred Fourth month 3d and 4th, at the home of the secretary, Emma B. Malone, Cleveland, Ohio. Eight members were present, representing six yearly meetings. Two other yearly meetings were represented by proxy. Arthur B. Chilson and wife (who left the 20th ult. for the field) were present and took part in the deliberations; also Martha W. Stanley, assistant secretary, and John A. Hasenpflug, purchasing agent.

Reports from the field show the work to be in good condition, whereas a year ago, on account of the Nandi war, the missionaries were exiled from their work by order of the British Government, the report this year shows the work resumed and three stations, instead of one, being maintained.

The evangelistic work is kept well to the foreground, and results are very manifest. Quite a number have already accepted Christ as their Saviour, and are leading worthy, Christian lives. A number of others are in the candidates' class.

About 60 pupils are in the day schools. Arrangements are being made so that these pupils may have parts of the Gospel to read in their own language. P. W. Raidabaugh has presented the Mission with a small printing press, which will enable them to do their own printing.

The medical phase of the work is very gratifying, although Dr. Blackburn has had to turn his attention largely to industrial work during the absence of A. B. Chilson.

A new dispensary and chapel are in progress. These are being built of brick, burned on the station and of very good quality. The Government has been very eager to buy a large quantity of these for its work at Kisumu. It is hoped, upon the arrival of A. B. Chilson, that the industrial feature of the Mission will be pushed along rapidly and preparations made for building permanent houses for the missionaries on each of the stations. It was also decided to send Charles Spann and wife, Albia, Iowa, this fall. He is an expert contractor and mechanic, and will make a valuable addition to the force.

The home end of the work is in prosperous condition. The treasurer's report showed all bills paid, and a small amount in the treasury. A. B. Chilson's work among the yearly meetings, during his furlough, resulted in a large number of pledges—some covering a period of five years. Besides these there are a number of special subscriptions made for a house, support of a missionary, support of a native worker, etc.

The coming year will be one of large expense to the Board. The equipping and sending out of four workers, and the returning of Edgar Hole and family, will cost nearly $2,000, not to speak of additional salaries. The friends of the African work everywhere are asked to remember this field in their prayers and their giving.

It was decided to continue The African Record for another year. Its quarterly visits have been a great inspiration to F. A. I. M. supporters, and it is the intention for it to help keep all contributors informed regarding the work.

The old officers of the Board were re-elected. Every question coming before the Board was settled without a dissenting voice, and under the manifest leading of the Holy Spirit.

Thanking God for His gracious care over our workers, his blessing on the work and his opening of the hearts of so many in America to the cry of Africa, we go forth to the work of the coming year with steadfast confidence in God and the friends of F. A. I. M.

CHARLES S. WHITE.

Earlham, Iowa, Fourth month 13, 1097.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

The spring term of Pacific College opened the 2d ult. with very good attendance.

H. Edwin McGrew, former president of Pacific College, and family left Newberg, Ore., on the 17th ult., for Boise, Idaho. They will probably go to Colorado later.

Nathan T. Frame recently attended a Sabbath evening service at Noblesville, Ind., and preached acceptably from the text "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I."

President Robert L. Kelly has accepted an invitation to deliver the Baccalaureate address this year to the graduating class of the Indiana State Normal School at Terre Haute.

Through the labor of James H. Pierce and Paris Cox, who labored in special revival services at La Port, Ind., in Third month, the Friends were strengthened and revived.

There are now seven "student volunteers" in attendance at Earlham College. Their "band" recently reorganized, re-electing the following officers: President, Norman Wann; vice-president, Edna Metcalf; chairman of Deputation Committee, Walter Miles.

A circle of young Friends in Kansas City are beginning the study of the Gospel of John. Jesse I. Phillip outlined the course, and the members are entering into the work with enthusiasm.

The meeting at Stafford, Kan., was favored by having L. Clarkson Hinshaw, Yearly Meeting Evangelistic Superintendent, present the 21st ult. He preached two very able sermons. The meeting is still in the need of some one that has the gift of leading in singing.

In Second month we received a remittance for a subscription and made the entry for F. L. Hollingsworth, La Fayette, Ind. Letters sent to that address have been returned unclaimed. Information leading to a discovery of our error in this entry will be thankfully received.

The Quakerism Class, in Kansas City, concluded their work for the year by holding an open meeting, Fourth month 2d. Their study has been the "Life of Fox" and papers on this subject and on some of the doctrines of early Friends were presented. The class expects to resume the study of Quaker history next winter.

Oscar Moon, who has served the University Meeting at Wichita, Kan., very acceptably as pastor for the past eighteen months, has been granted a leave of absence. He will spend the time at Earlham College, completing a course of study for his Master's degree, which he will take in Sixth month. He expects to resume his work in the University Meeting about the middle of Sixth month.

In the recent municipal election at Wichita, Kan., the principal point at issue was the attempt to close all saloons, gambling houses and resorts. The reform party won a decisive victory, their candidate receiving a majority of 1,899 votes. Of this majority, the Fifth Ward, where the greater part of the Friends reside, contributed almost 1,000. Many Friends, both men and women, took a very active part in the reform movement.

Zenas L. and Susie J. Martin are staying, for the time being, in Baltimore. They were compelled to leave Cuba, on account of the latter's ill-health. She is receiving treatment, and is improving as rapidly as could be expected. Zenas L. Martin spent two days at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. He expects to return to Cuba in the near future. Susie J. Martin will remain with friends in and near Baltimore during the summer months.

Communications from Harpoot, Turkey, tell of the need for financial aid to carry on the Armenian Orphanage work there. This industrial plant is the only one of the kind in the great Turkish empire, and it is doing in that country for orphans and needy boys and girls what Hampton and Tuskegee are doing for colored youths in America. Remittances may be sent to Brown Bros. & Co., 59 Wall Street, New York City, marked "for Harpoot."

A series of meetings were held in Jonesboro, Ind., from the 11th to the 28th of Second month. The pastor, William West, opened the meetings, and was soon joined by Mary Cox, Indianapolis. There were 28 conversions and renewals, and 12 united with Friends. There was a good interest manifested from the first. William West is now on his fourth year as pastor, and there has been a steady growth in the meeting, both in spiritual life and in additions to the membership.

Richard Harkness and wife, Tecumseh, Mich., celebrated the sixty-fourth anniversary of their marriage, Fourth month 20th, at the home of their grandson, Walter F. Causie, near Jackson, Mich. Fifteen members of the family and three invited guests were present. After a bountiful dinner had been served, a short religious service was held, consisting of Scripture reading, prayer, etc. All sang "God be With You 'Till We Meet Again" before parting. The occasion was enjoyed by all present.

The final debate for championship in the league of Oregon colleges was held at Newberg the 12th ult., and resulted in a victory for Pacific College, thus giving it first place in debating for 1906-7 among the colleges of Oregon. Paul Maris, Clarence Brown and Ralph Rees composed the team this year. The question was, "Resolved, That the United States Government should own and operate all the railroads." Pacific College affirming the same. Both the question debated and the side to be taken are assigned by the Executive Committee, composed of members from all the colleges in the State.

The following is taken from the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette: "Another handsome church edifice is soon to be added to the many which already add so materially to the beauty of Worcester, with the erection of a new church by the Worcester Friends on the site of their old meeting-house at the corner of Chatham and Oxford Streets, the cornerstone for which is to be formally laid Saturday, May 11th, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

"For sixty years the little Quaker Church has been the meeting place for the Worcester Friends. It has become a landmark which was viewed with considerable interest by many. Plain and unadorned, the little one-story wooden structure, without even so much as a clapboard to mar its simplicity, the Friends' Church has been an object of much interest to Worcester people and to many visitors.

"With the laying of the corner-stone, a modern brick meeting-house will be started, although the new edifice will be simple, in accord with the views of Quaker people. Architect Stephen C. Earle, whose family name has been closely allied with the Friends' Church and its work, has prepared the plans for the new building and, despite its simplicity, the structure will be very attractive.

"The Worcester Friends' meeting is an outgrowth of the Leicester meeting, which was established in that town in 1732. The Worcester Friends established a meeting and erected a little meeting-house on Oxford Street in 1847, and have met there continuously for sixty years.

JUST A MINUTE.

When'er he faced a task and knew

He should begin it

He could not start to put it through

For "just a minute."

And, though the case demanded speed,

He could not move just then; but he'd

Be ready for it, yes indeed,

In "just a minute."

His purposes were out of rhyme,

By "just a minute."

The whole world seemed ahead of time

By "just a minute."

He could not learn to overhaul

His many duties, large and small,

But had to beg them, one and all,

To "wait a minute."

In manhood he was still delayed

By "just a minute."

He might have won, had fortune stayed

For "just a minute."

But at the end of life he railed

At "cruel fate," and wept and wailed

Because he knew that he had failed

By "just a minute."

Teach Me

Teach me, Father, how to go
Softly as the grasses grow;
Hush my soul to meet the shock
Of the wild world as a rock;
But my spirit, prompt with power,
Make as simple as a flower;
Let the dry heart fill its cup
Like a poppy looking up;
Let Life lightly wear her crown
Like the poppy looking down
When its heart is filled with dew
And its life begins anew.

Teach me, Father, how to be Kind and patient as a tree;
Joyfully the crickets croon
Under shady oak at noon
Beetle, on his mission bent,
Tarries in that cooling tent;
Let me, also, cheer a spot,
Hidden field or garden grot—
Place where passing souls can rest
On the way and be their best.

A TOPMOST VIRTUE.

There is a pretty steady verdict that "the greatest thing in the world" is love, but it is not so well settled what comes second. What is the next greatest thing to love? Our answer is, patience. It is a mother virtue, the parent of all that is great and noble in life. There is no hero without it, and no saint that has it not.

The main difference between persons in this world of ours lies in their power, or their lack of power, to live straight on by the soul's vision of what ought to be, and their power, or lack of power, to work heroically and wait calmly for the achievement of the vision. This inward power is what we mean by patience. It is the deepest test of character there is. The child has very little of it. He is weak in his power to construct a vision of what ought to be, and he is weak in his power of control. He cannot wait for what is far off. The immediate, the nearby, sways him and gets his vote. A small thing in the present counts more than a great thing a week hence. He has a slender stock of remote consideration. He cannot endure hardness, he breaks down under delays, he flies to pieces when his desires are baffled. He is not a being of patience.

But woe unto him if he does not learn it. Apparently, the whole machinery of the universe is built with a purpose of teaching patience. It says to us every day: "Thou must wait;" "thou must postpone;" "thou must go through this experience, in order to get that result." The "spoiled child," whether he is old or young, is a person who cannot wait, who wants his victories without any struggles, who takes "shun-pikes" and "short-cuts," so as to get his ends without the proper toil that achieves them. He wants the joys without the dust and sweat. He is "spoiled," because he has missed the very point which the whole structure of the world was pressing on him.

The "trained fleas" furnish a parable of this truth.

These "trained fleas" are extraordinarily clever and skillful. They walk "tight ropes," are harnessed into tiny coaches with other fleas for drivers, and they race about a track with all the eagerness of us larger humans. Now, in order to be trained, they are put at first into small glass bottles, through which they can look out on the world. Their first act is to try to jump through the glass. They hit their heads and tumble back, and then jump up and try again with the same result. The wise flea who proves fit for further training is the one who soon discovers the foolishness of beating his "brains" out against the glass wall. He takes in the situation and waits for some other chance of attaining his end. He is then taken out and given the next lesson. The foolish flea learns nothing from his defeats, and pounds away in sheer stupidity. He is rejected as a "spoiled flea."

The moral machinery of the universe is our glass bottle. He who tries to dash through to quick profits and easy joys, who learns nothing from the stern situations of life, is the foolish child to the end of his days—the lessons of experience are wasted on him.

The wise soul learns to forecast and to wait. He is patient in the hard present, because he takes by faith the better future that awaits him, and sets himself confidently to work to produce that future. He is not disturbed by the noisy voices that cry around him for some other path than the one which his inward voice bids him walk. He keeps on quietly saying, yea, though the multitude loudly shouts, nay, for he knows that in the end yea will prevail. He does not strive, nor cry, nor lift up his voice in the street. He does not denounce, nor attack—he believes in his truth, and is unswervingly loyal to it, for he sees that in the eternal nature of things it is bound to win out. This is patience—a topmost virtue; and one of the noblest souls that ever lived, one who learned to endure hardness and to overcome the world by faith, called God, "the God of all patience." R. M. J.

VERACITY IN RELIGION.

It is a very common thing in religious meetings to be told that if we were only faithful things would be very different. Sinners would be converted by the score and the world would be evangelized in a few years. Sometimes, in a burst of enthusiasm, a speaker will declare that if only six or a dozen men would do all that God wanted them to do, the whole region round about for miles would be "taken for Him." At other times ministers are the special targets for criticism, and the wickedness of a city or community is charged to their half-heartedness or inertia, and sometimes to their misdeeds. These wholesale tirades are very common. They are part of the stock in trade of some professional evangelist. Now they are very serious charges if they are true, and if they are not true, it is time some one was making a protest.

Is it a fact that there are less than a score of Christians among the many thousand church members in cities like Philadelphia, who are earnestly doing the best they know for God and their fellow-men? If all the ministers of this city should work night and day with the "divine unction" upon them, could they take the city for God in one year, or even in ten? Most emphatically, no. And such exaggerations seem to us decidedly injurious to the cause of truth. Such ideas are contrary to the divine plan. They are opposed to God's scheme of redemption. We do not intend to convey the idea that Christian people are doing all they can for the advancement of the kingdom. Far from it. The great majority of church-members are living decidedly below their privileges, and far short of their whole duty. Ministers, taken as a class, care too little for eternal things. They could and should have cleaner and more spirit-filled lives, and do more efficient work. Even the most consecrated Christian can and should improve. But we verily believe that there are many Christians who are faithful. Scarcely a community can be found without one or more of them. They are doing, and have been doing for years, the best they knew, and, we are constrained to believe, not far from the whole will of God. And their lives do count for good. The world is sweeter and better by far for their having lived in it. Their presence bears a halo of the Saviour's benediction, "well done, thou good and faithful servant." It is a profound conviction with us that we thank God far too little for the precious lives about us, and for the many kindnesses which we receive from loving hands.

We must not put a limit on the power of God in human lives, nor the work which can be wrought by consecrated souls, but it is a false idea to think that God is going to turn the world upside down when we and a half-dozen others are "filled with the spirit." God does not do things that way. He will certainly bless us and make us a blessing, but after we have done our best, and done it for years, there will still be fields to conquer, still be victories to win. Nor is God asking the ministers nor any other class of chosen men, be they ever so useful and necessary, to save the whole world. The call is to every one. It is the whole church that should move out, and every one has a work to do. Duty performed means advance; duty neglected means loss. God is calling us to give ourselves to Him for service. He is longing to come into our lives and help us, but, when all is done, we can do but a humble part and rejoice that the cause we love is winning its way in the world, and as the years go by making the kingdoms of this world the Kingdom of our Lord.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE STORY OF THE MOON.

BY PROF. ERNEST W. BROWN, F. R. S.

There is no more wonderful example of the great effects which can be brought about through the smallest agencies than that furnished by the history of the past and future relations of the earth and moon. We are so accustomed to think of the larger changes in nature as being brought about by colossal forces, that we fail to realize the fact that the forces used are often so small that it is difficult to detect them, and much more so to measure them. We hear of the earthquake, the volcanic eruption, the inundation, and yet even these are usually the final result of a gradual accumulation of small forces, each adding its part to the rest until their combined effect can no longer be resisted. Even the great governing force in nature, which we call gravitation, and by which every particle of matter tries to pull every other particle, is so minute that only the most refined methods enable its measurement to be made in a laboratory. Yet we see it acting everywhere. It takes the pull of the whole matter of the earth, a globe eight thousand miles in diameter, to produce the force which keeps us on the ground, and even this force, which we call our weight, is overcome by the weak muscles of the body every time we walk upstairs. Small as the force is, each particle of matter adds its quota until we have a pull which keeps the moon circulating round the earth instead of flying off at a tangent, and which retains all the bodies of the solar system in the form of huge masses, which we know as sun, planets and satellites, instead of as collections of particles flying aimlessly through space.

The same force produces the tides, whose rise and fall we observe on the shores of the ocean twice every day. As the earth turns on its axis once in twenty-four hours, it shows every part of its surface to the moon, and that body tries to draw off towards itself, against the pull of the earth, anything that is free to move. There is one part of the earth which is free to move, and that is the water which covers three-fourths of its surface. The moon pulls the water, and it also pulls the earth, but when the moon is overhead on the ocean, the water which is right under it is nearer to the moon than is the solid body of the earth, and so it draws the water more than it draws the earth. There is therefore a slight heaping up of the water under the moon, and this follows the moon as the earth turns round. The wave of higher water, which thus follows the moon, we know as the tide. But the moon also pulls the earth more than it pulls the water, which is farthest away from it, so that some of the water on the opposite side of the earth is, so to speak, left behind, and it appears to be heaped up there, also. There are then two waves of water traveling 'round the earth, one nearly under the moon and one farthest away from it, and we have the rise of the water at any place twice a day as the two waves reach that place.

Thus, the tides are produced by the difference of the attractions of the moon on the solid body of the earth and on the water which covers its surface. This difference is quite insensible on a gallon of water, and yet when it acts on the huge masses of liquid that form the oceans it is able to make the waters rise and fall. The process might go on for ever, if astronomers had not been able to discover another force even more minute than that which raises the tides; so minute, indeed, that not only can it not be measured, but even in the hundred and fifty years during which its existence has been recognized, the most delicate observations have been insufficient to detect its effects. This force is gradually tending to slow down the rotation of the earth on its axis, and, the rotation being the cause of day and night, it means that the day and night instead of being twenty-four hours will become longer. The minute force is similar to that which gradually brings a fly-wheel to rest, if left to itself. The wheel runs on bearings, and the friction of the axle on the bearings acts as a brake which tends to stop the motion. The earth is a kind of fly-wheel without bearings, but the friction is supplied by those two tide-waves, which travel over its surface every day. Yet, so small is the amount of this friction that hundreds of years must elapse before it can increase the length of the day by a single second, and many millions of years will be required before the rotation of the earth can be stopped by this force.

The friction of the tides has also a reactionary effect on the moon; it tends to send the moon farther away from the earth and to make the lunar month longer. The curious reader who wishes to know the process by which this takes place will find the explanation elsewhere than within the limits of a short article. Here, then, are the chief effects of the friction of the tides: the lengthening of the day, the lengthening of the lunar month, and the increase of the distance of the moon from the earth. With these facts as a basis, it has been possible to make an attempt toward the discovery of the past and future history of the relations between the earth and her satellite, and I shall sketch it briefly.

In the dim past, perhaps fifty millions of years ago, perhaps much longer, a molten mass of fluid and gas, not unlike our sun, though much smaller, was making a complete revolution round its axis every few hours; the processes which led up to this condition are matters of speculation only, and are generally referred to as the "nebular hypothesis." A large yielding body revolving in this way becomes flattened at the poles, and there is a strong tendency for the parts near the equator to fly off like the pieces of a fly-wheel which has burst from a too rapid rotation; they are only just kept together by their weight, which corresponds to the pull of the spokes in the case of the fly-wheel. This condition of affairs was too unstable to last long; the body must lose its shape, and one of the forms which it can take is that of a pear spinning on its side. Later on the pear developed a furrow near its smaller end, which became deeper and deeper until the shape had changed into that of a dumbbell with a thin handle, and with one end much larger than the other. At this stage the handle soon broke, leaving two masses, a larger and a smaller, revolving round one another very close together.

This is one of the ways, perhaps the most probable way, in which our moon was born. It is true that it cannot be accepted as a proved statement, for there are other theories which will account for the main facts. Nevertheless, the arguments by which mathematicians have been able to follow the process are sound after the first idea of a rapidly-revolving molten body has been assumed. Once the bodies have separated, rigorous argument takes the place of speculation. With two yielding bodies only just separated and moving round one another and round their own axes, the tides which each raised in the other must have been enormous, and the friction of these tides passing over their surfaces correspondingly great. The work of the friction in acting as a brake and in increasing the distance had begun. The earth's day, during the lapse of vast periods of time, gradually lengthened from a few hours to the twenty-four, which it now has; and the moon, as its distance from the earth increased, took longer and longer to go through its phases until it reached the present time of twenty-seven days. Meanwhile the bodies were cooling, and the water, which afterwards covered their surfaces, had to take the place of liquid lava in producing the tidal friction; the process went on just the same, but at a slower pace.

It is not hard to see why the moon always turns the same face to the earth. Just as the moon raises tides on the earth, so the earth has raised tides on the moon, but the earth being eighty times as heavy as the moon, the tides on the moon must have been enormously greater. So the slowing down of the moon's rotation has taken place at a much more rapid rate; perhaps the tidal friction had finished its work before the moon had time to become thoroughly cool, and certainly before its seas had time to sink gradually into the interior. It revolved more and more slowly until there was no tide at all moving round its surface: the high tide always remained in the same place—right opposite the earth. Thus the moon would have a tide if there were water on its surface, but high tide would always be in the same spot, so that it would not move over the surface of that body.

The future fate of the earth will be the same. Both the earth's day and the lunar month will continue to increase, the former more rapidly than the latter, until the day is equal to the month, and both of them are more than a thousand hours long. Then, not only will the moon present the same face to the earth, but the earth will always present the same face to the moon, so that one-half of its inhabitants (if the human race still continues to exist) will have sunshine for twenty of our present days, and no moon to light the long nights. For the other portion of the earth, a half-moon will rise as the sun sets and gradually increase to full moon at midnight, setting at the end of its third quarter as the dawn commences.

At this point only wild speculation can take up the story. Perhaps both bodies may gradually fall back into the sun, perhaps a visitor from the distant stars may have disturbed the harmony of the solar system. Here I must leave a subject which is as fascinating as it is doubtful: the generations which will follow us may be able to speak more clearly.

TEXTS THAT HAVE HELPED AND COMFORTED ME.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

Coleridge's remark that "The Bible is the only book that always finds me" has been abundantly verified in the experience of myriads of Christians. Other cisterns of thought run dry; this divine fountain of truth is inexhaustible. For every mood of mind, for every perplexity, every emergency, and every trial there is a precious message for us. The Bible of many a veteran Christian has its margins lined with pencil marks against favorite and well-tested texts.

There is one text that has helped me wonderfully; it is that not unfamiliar one in the fifty-ninth Psalm: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." The Hebrew word translated "burden" signifies that which is given to us to bear. The Psalmist means to say that whatever Providence appoints to us, we must lay it upon the Lord. He has cast thy lot for thee; then cast thy lot upon Him. It may seem at first sight as if there was a contradiction between this text and that other one. "For every man shall bear his own burden." But there is no contradiction at all. We have our duties to perform, sometimes very difficult duties; God does not release us from them, but He sustains us in the doing them. The load laid upon us does not crush us, for He gives us strength equal to the day; we lay the load upon the strength which our loving Father imparts to us. God's wonderfully gracious offer to us in this text is to lighten our burdens by putting Himself, as it were, into our souls, and underneath the burdens. This is a supernatural process; and the whole walk of faith through life is the simple, but sublime reliance upon the Almighty arm that is never seen, but often felt.

This is a world of worries, and all around us are overloaded people; each one thinks his or her burden is the biggest. In the meantime our merciful Father keeps saying to every one of them; "Cast thy burden upon the Lord and He will sustain thee." As if this one offer were not enough, it is repeated again in the New Testament, "cast all your anxieties upon Him, for He careth for you." This is the more accurate rendering in the Revised Version; for the word translated "care" in our Common Version does not signify wise forethought, but that wretched thing, worry. This text has been delightfully helpful to me, because I have a natural tendency to anxieties, and the reason given for rolling them over upon God is very tender and very touching. "He careth for you." He takes the deepest interest in you. He is the One who says to me, "My child, do not break yourself down with that burden." The infinite Ruler of the universe, who is wise in counsel and wonderful in working—the God who guarded the infant Moses in his cradle of rushes; who sent the messenger birds to Elijah by the brook Cherith; who quieted Daniel among the ravenous lions, and calmed Paul in the raging tempest—He it is who says to us, "Roll your anxieties over on Me, for I have you on My loving heart!" What fools we often are when we trudge along with bended backs and careworn hearts; and all the while God's omnipotent arm is stretched out to relieve us!

These twin-texts I have just quoted have more than once exorcised that demon of "worry," and made me move nimbly over the path of duty. Sometimes in a season of great perplexity a passage of Scripture has suddenly darted its light upon me, and made the pathway very clear to my eyes. A remarkable illustration of this occurred to me during my ministry in New York. My downtown field of labor was a very difficult one; and a very attractive call was pressed upon me from a prominent, wealthy and prosperous church in a Western city. For weeks I was perplexed and sought guidance. One day I opened that richly-suggestive old book, "Cecil's Remains," and my eye rested on a passage in which Richard Cecil remarks that changes in life are often dangerous, especially if an appeal is made to selfish ambition. Then followed this text from the prophet, Jeremiah, "Why gaddest thou about to change thy way?" That decided me in an instant. Never have I ceased to thank God for that little text; but for it I might have missed a distinct call from God—soon afterwards—to this city of Brooklyn, in which I have been permitted to do the most important work of my life.

We ministers are constantly required to administer consolation to afflicted souls, and we are often in some need of heaven-sent comfort ourselves. Once when God had taken from the home—of which she was an ornament and delight—a beautiful and beloved daughter, the following text came to me like a dove of peace flying into my window: "And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds; but the wind passeth and cleanseth (or cleareth) them." An exceedingly dark and mysterious cloud of bereavement was overhanging. I needed some revealing wind to clear away the dark and dreadful mystery of that affliction, and to let some rays of light into the hearts of two grief-stricken parents. One of the truths that beamed in upon us was that there is a great want in all ministers and teachers who have had no personal education in the bearing of sharp trials. We need lessons that only can be learned through tears, just as Paul needed a thorn in the flesh, and Joseph needed to be shut up in a prison in order that he might reach a palace and a premiership in the kingdom of Egypt. Fellow Christians! do we not all need to be taught that dark clouds often rain down precious blessings—that Christ's people are never more exalted than when laid low, never so enriched as when they are emptied, never so advanced as when they are set back by faith-trying adversities? God is a marvelous organist, and knows just what heart-chorus to strike when He would evoke the melodies He loveth to hear.

If affliction drives us from Him it becomes a curse; if it sends us closer to Him it yields certain otherwise unobtainable blessings. Through the parted clouds of sorrow, good angels of mercy descend upon us. One of them says, "All things work together for good to them that love God." Still another sings in our ears, "Let not your heart be troubled; believe also in me." And so, as our vision gets cleansed with tears, we begin to see bright light breaking through the clouds. No cloud ever can be big enough or black enough to shut out heaven if we keep the eye of faith steadily on the everlasting Throne.

PEACE JONES.

[This article was written one year ago and printed as an editorial in THE AMERICAN FRIEND for Fifth month 3, 1906, under the title, "An ordinary Saint." The person herein described was Peace Jones, whose death was reported last week.—Ed.]

She was born in a little cleared place, with dense forests all about, in a "new country." She came into a home where work was the standing order of the day. All the clothes for the large family had to be made from the raw wool and flax. The farm produced practically everything which came into the house, and whatever was done was done by hand. Life, from the start, was a somewhat stern round of duty, but it was always, in this home, relieved and sweetened by love.

There was slender chance for mental culture. In a rough school-house, in the clearing, a native teacher introduced the little girl to the mysteries of grammar and figures. She learned the bare essentials—reading, writing and arithmetic—and she had one book upon which she fed her imagination—a book which helped her build the world in which she lived and moved, as though it were more real than the one she saw with her eyes. This book was the Bible.

She was a genuine girl, with the enthusiasms and hopes which suited her youth. She was no "born" saint, pushed into holiness by a sort of mechanical inward spring. She had a will of her own and a "nature," which on occasion could be as stubborn and cross-grained as that which the rest of us have. Her brothers and sisters and playmates never thought of calling her "little saint."

But she grew up in a home in which religion was the supreme reality. Her parents believed in work, but they believed still more in God. They did not talk much about their religion, and probably could not have recited a single one of the historic creeds, but they practiced the presence of God. The roots of their lives were in Him, and they drew their strength and power from Him. Without much direct teaching this little girl began to discover, there in her forest home, that there is another world besides this one of flax and wool, pork and potatoes, a world more real and more beautiful than the one the eyes see. Pretty early in her youth she decided to live in this world where God is and to shape her life to fit that inner and eternal world. A new light came in her eyes, a lustre on her face and a sweetness in her manners. She began, at the very edge of womanhood, to "speak in meeting," telling in a simple, convincing, straightforward way what realities her growing soul was finding.

Each year the tasks of life grew thicker, for a new child came to the family almost annually, and the elder daughter had to bear a heavy share in the feeding and clothing of the large flock. Deep experiences of human love came to her, but they were too sacred for her ever to tell why she chose to live and die single—a neuter flower. She had unusual capacity for love, and, as her love never centered on any one person, she always seemed to have an inexhaustible supply to pour out on all who needed it. The result was that, while she missed the closest bond of earthly love, she showed and she received a wealth of love which falls to the lot of few mortals.

Her days of toil for others were occasionally interrupted by "religious visits," when she went out from her country home to engage in extensive service for her Master. She made and sold butter to provide for the journey, but those who saw her and heard her could never have imagined the hard routine and privation of her home life. She bore no marks of narrow toil. There were grace and refinement in her bearing, a power and dignity in her manner, and her words came with an ease and flow which many who possess culture never attain. She had the culture and refinement which the divine grace forms within the obedient soul, and it was a wonder to see how all who came under her influence were slowly changed in life and manners. This dear saintly soul has helped form the spiritual life and character of three generations, and hundreds rise up to call her blessed, though she, in broken health and faded memory, has outlived herself and now waits the restoration which her release will bring. Such lives, which breathe the holy fragrance of God's redeeming, transforming grace, make religions of form and creed and bitter controversy look poor and beggarly.

Some Views on Present Day Topics.

CONVERTED—TO WHAT?

BY ONE WHO BELIEVES IN FRIENDS' COLLEGES.

The other day a Friends' minister (and pastor) was railing against one of our colleges. I quietly called attention to the fact that said college had witnessed the conversion of between 50 and 100 of its students during the past six months. The home churches had not only failed to reach these young people in a religious way before they went to college, but, in more than one instance, had turned these young people against religion.

Instead of complimenting the college upon its evangelical spirit and successful work, this preacher sneeringly remarked, "Converted—to what?"

Is not this a practical question to ask, not only concerning the converts at our colleges, but also of those converted in our churches and revival meetings—converted to what?

The great concern of the apostle was that Christ might be formed within; that the life lived in the flesh might manifest the spirit of Christ. This was also the main concern of the first Quaker, George Fox.

If converts are made by "rag-time" music, by sensational and emotional "preaching," consisting of jokes, alternating with funereal anecdotes, it will be small wonder if their chief affinities seem to be with the visionary and the sensational.

A "great" revival was held near here this month. The gift of tongues did not make its appearance, but "trances" did, and they lasted for hours. Many "converts" were reported. The monthly meeting, after the "evangelist" left, lasted seven hours, and resulted in no business being transacted. To what do these "pastors" and "evangelists," who preach sensation and sentiment, convert people? The highest ideal of pastor, with a considerable element in some communities, is not that of a man of God, thoroughly equipped mentally, acquainted not only with his Bible, but with the history of the church and with the thought of the age, but a man who can appeal to people from the standpoint of dress, and whose pastoral gift consists largely in the ability to spend several hours each day in the village store or on the street corner as the exponent of the latest joke.

Too often the popular idea of "spirituality" is not that of a life hid with Christ in God, but a wave of neurotic emotionalism, the more hysterical the more spiritual it is thought to be.

Ranterism is not a cause, but an effect, not the tree, but the fruit. It can usually be traced to the style of preaching, and kind of music. The quiet, intelligent conversion at college, which centers in the will and affects the entire person, is a type of conversion which can show a far larger percentage of converts to Jesus Christ than many of the revivals in our churches or camp-meetings. The writer is pastor to a meeting where there are many college graduates, who are all active Christians.

THE CHURCH.

CAROLINE A. CLARK.

The trend of many editorials and other articles in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of latter time, indicate an awakening to the disabilities among Friends, with a desire to find remedies, which is certainly wise. It is to be expected that there will be a difference of opinion; a free parliament may help to adjust our difficulties.

Those who hold dear the fundamental principles of the early Friends, believe that a sincere carrying out of these first principles would supply these remedies, and carry to the human heart the help all so much need; this opinion is not apparent so much to others. We speak now of methods of worship and methods of doing the work of the church. The early Friends had no regular order in their work. Each individual looked to the Lord for his work, and the church judged the service, looking to the Lord for wisdom; hence, the exhortation was always in place—"For individual faithfulness to known duty." Of latter time we hear little of this preaching, but not very seldom the request, that a large number give testimony in five minutes, or there is a request for as many sentence prayers in the same time, without any allusion being made to the will of the Lord in the matter. There are dangers attending individualism, as we probably have all noticed, but is it not far better that occasional abuses of real liberty occur, that judicious caretakers could generally correct, than a pre-arranged service, so common in the religious world?

We are affected much by practices, which, in time, become fixed habits; not less by religious than by secular occupations. The Lord deals with men as individuals. He saves us one by one. He will account with us one by one. Every man will stand or fall alone. If this is true, which no one will question, is it not as true we must find our work one by one? The carefulness of the early Friends in allowing every man his own work (always in the Spirit), wrought great care in each worker not to go beyond his guide and also to be in a fit condition to judge righteously his brother or sister. Would not this care, in our day and in all time, preserve the church from the schisms which have marred its history? First, a diligent care for his own spiritual health; second, for his neighbor. "One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." It has been said that if Friends had remained faithful to first principles the world would not have needed the Methodist revival of a hundred years later. The Friends are rich in biography of the heroes of the first fifty years of their history, with sometimes a pathetic disregard (as we think in our day) of the human side due, no doubt, to the prevalent asceticism of the age.

The changes which have come to our Society in the last twenty-five years have thrown some earnest workers into a partial inactivity—not wishing to become opposers, and yet unable to encourage the many changes—they have been waiting for a time when there would be an opening for the message still burning in their hearts. Could there be a more impressive lesson to those who have been trained to a pre-arranged worship than to see the congregations of Friends everywhere led by the Spirit? "Not with the wisdom which man teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth"—laying open the deepest needs of the heart and giving sure direction and inspiring hope to every sin-sick soul.

Many changes may be expected from a growing civilization that will remove many scandals which now pain the eye and ear; but there will never be changes in the nature of sin to deceive the human heart, as depicted in the Bible; nor any other remedy provided for the salvation of the soul. If the Scripture standard of holiness be the Christian's aim, though he may sometimes fall short, he will yet experience growth in this "most excellent way."

ISRAEL ENSLAVED IN EGYPT.

Exodus 1: 1-14.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fifth mo. 13.—Israel enslaved in Egypt. Exod. 1: 1-14.
Third-day, Fifth mo. 14.—A great nation. Gen. 46: 1-7.
Fourth-day, Fifth mo. 15.—Cruel taskmasters. Exod. 5: 5-19.

Sixth-day, Fifth mo. 17.—Oppressed without cause. Isa. 52: 1-6.
Seventh-day, Fifth mo. 18.—Prayer in affliction. Psalm 142.
First-day, Fifth mo. 19.—Cry of the oppressed. Ps. 94: 1-14.

Time.—Possibly about 1275 B. C. It is impossible to speak with certainty.

Place.—Egypt; principally in the land of Goshen.

Rulers.—It is now very generally believed that the "Pharaoh of the Oppression" was Rameses (or Ramses) II. His mummy was discovered 1881, and is now in the Museum of Cairo. Photographs of it are common. The Greeks knew him as Sesostris. The second book of the Bible takes its name from the title given in the Septuagint or Greek version, and means "departure," referring to the departure of the Israelites from Egypt. It covers the period from the death of Joseph to the setting up of the Tabernacle in the wilderness, a period perhaps of 480 years. The great figure of the book is Moses. "Few books in the Old Testament have a higher conception of God than Exodus." The book falls easily into three portions, (1) Israel in Egypt; (2) Egypt to Sinai; (3) At Sinai.

After the coming into Egypt of Jacob and his household and followers, they were apparently left unmolested and greatly prospered, and increased in numbers. The Hebrews grew from a family or household into a tribe, or community of organized tribes, and became an important element in the polity of the kingdom. A moment's reflection will give some idea of how they were regarded by the ruler of Egypt. They were semitic in their origin, and, should any trouble arise between Pharaoh and the nations to the northeast, it was more than likely that the Israelites would sympathize with the enemies of Egypt and aid them. We can, therefore, easily imagine why Pharaoh should take the Hebrews from their pastoral life and force them to labor upon the great public works he was constructing, thus reducing them to the condition of serfs. Their treatment was doubtless part of a great scheme of public policy, and not oppression simply for the sake of oppression. Of course, this does not justify, but it does explain what otherwise seems something like a refinement of cruelty due simply to jealousy.

There are very few data from which to draw conclusions as to the spiritual condition of the Israelites during their long sojourn in Egypt. It would seem that at least the most important traditions were preserved, and that in the main they did not intermarry with the Egyptians, but formed a community by themselves. They would seem to have kept the rite of circumcision; to have offered sacrifice to Jehovah (Ex. 10: 25); and to have observed the Sabbath, if we are to take "Remember the Sabbath day" to refer to something with which the Israelites were familiar. It is also tolerably certain that the truth they did hold was very much mixed up with superstition, and that many of them were quite ready to mix up worship of the gods of Egypt with worship of Jehovah.

1-5. A recapitulation of history. It is not possible to do more than guess at the total number that came into Egypt. Some think about 3,000. The size of these households may be inferred from that of Abraham, who was able to furnish 318 armed men (Gen. 26: 16). In the list of names the children of Leah come first, then Benjamin, son of Rachel; then the sons of the handmaids; Joseph is put by himself as being already in Egypt. "Seventy souls." Jacob's sons and their descendants.

6. Joseph lived to see his great-grandchildren (Gen. 50: 23).

7. "Were fruitful." In children. "The land." Goshen.

8. "A new king which knew not Joseph." Probably a new dynasty is meant. The length of the stay in Egypt has been variously estimated from 215 to 480 years. It is impossible with present knowledge to speak accurately. The Hyksos or Shepherd Kings were of semitic origin. The new dynasty was Egyptian.

9. "His people." His council or chief men. "Are more and mightier than we." Clearly a false statement, but wholly in accord with the common Oriental habit of exaggeration.

10. "Wisely." Shrewdly.

11. "Taskmasters." Overseers of labor, especially of forced labor. "And they built for Pharaoh store cities." R. V. Strongholds or magazines, where military stores could be laid up in preparation for invasion. "Pithom and Raamses." Both these were in Goshen. Pithom was discovered in 1883 not far from the Suez Canal. Among the ruins inscriptions were found bearing the word, Pi-Tum (house of Tum). Some of the bricks (unburnt) are in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in New York.

12. The means they adopted were of no avail.
 13. "With rigor." Severity. The severity of their taskmasters was terrible—scourging, incessant labor to which they were forced by the rod.
 14. "Bondage." Better "service." "In mortar." Preparing the clay for brick-making. "In brick." Laying the brick.

LITTLE FAULTS THAT SPOIL OUR LIVES.

Song of Solomon 2: 15. (Union meeting with the Juniors.)

Second-day, Fifth mo. 13.—The fault of slothfulness. Prov. 12: 24-28.

Third-day, Fifth mo. 14.—Nagging. II Cor. 13: 10-14.

Fourth-day, Fifth mo. 15.—Boasting. Jas. 4: 13-17.

Fifth-day, Fifth mo. 16.—Backbiting. Rom. 1: 30-32.

Sixth-day, Fifth mo. 17.—Vanity. Prov. 30: 7-9.

Seventh-day, Fifth mo. 18.—Brawling. Prov. 21: 8-10.

When we acknowledge—as we must, that the "little foxes" do "spoil the vineyards," we may well hesitate to call any fault little. The spots and wrinkles are to be removed from her garments before Christ can present to Himself a "glorious church." One of the wisdom sayings of ancient Israel tells us that "Dead flies cause the ointment of the perfumer to send forth a stinking savor," and likens them to the little folly that outweighs a man's real wisdom and honor. So the question comes again, "What fault is little?"

"You need not break the glasses of a telescope, or coat them over with paint, in order to prevent you from seeing through them. Just breathe upon them, and the dew of your breath will shut out all the stars. So it does not require great crimes to hide the light of God's countenance. Little faults can do it just as well." The light of the stars beams none the less steadily for the film of vapor over the lens, but the vision is cut off; and while we love to think of God's unfailing faithfulness and His persistent yearning over us, it is a perilous thing to let even a little obstacle cut off our vision of Him and of His purposes and methods.

The suggestion that this topic be considered in a joint meeting with the Juniors gives a wealth of Scripture references in the brief selections offered as daily readings. Solomon dwelt on the slothfulness which keeps a man from correcting even the errors that he sees in himself, or from using the opportunity that really lies within his grasp, like the hunter who is too lazy to roast that which he has taken in hunting. Contentiousness, too, comes in for frequent condemnation. Honest and loving correction is not infrequently in place; but how hard it is to keep a spirit of sharpness and condemnation out of it, and how easy to enter into a spirit of disputatiousness that makes so much argument unfruitful and worthless. The little boy who told his father that he and his companion were not having an argument, but that "I am just telling Jimmie the facts about it, and he's so awful stubborn he won't understand," expressed the feeling of many an older debater.

It is worth while to remember that Jesus said, "Ye are my witnesses," and not, Ye are my judges, sent forth to give sentence—nor even, Ye are my attorneys—but just witnesses to manifest by act and word what we have seen and known and experienced of Him. Doesn't that call for exemplary living? For we can not gloss over our imperfections, nor will we try, if we have that sheer, straightforward honesty that belongs to the pure in heart. But we will seek to crowd out every fault by cultivating the virtues He exemplified who became our pattern.

Christianity for domestic use is not zealous exhortation nor beneficence on a large scale. It is just the overcoming of a thousand petty temptations, the straightening of one angry little snarl after another, the bearing and forbearing for fifteen hours a day that means the conquest of the powers of evil and the reinforcement of the powers of good that will count for more than sacrifice and the fat of rams.

OPENING OF THE NEW HOSPITAL AT LUH HOH, CHINA.

DEAR FRIENDS:

At length we are able to announce the fact that the new hospital is open. The official opening occurred on First month 11th. We were already seeing the sick in the hospital dispensary and had received our first in-patient before the tardy opening arrived.

Some days before, the dedication announcements were posted at various important points throughout the city. Special invitations were sent to the city magistrate, deputy mayor and the superintendent of the Government school, besides quite a number of the head men. The hospital was cleaned and decorated. At 10 A. M. the invited guests appeared in full (Chinese) dress. After sipping tea in the consultation room, we entered the chapel. Four students from Margaret Holmes Boys' Boarding School sang a hymn. They sang with such clearness of accent and correctness of time as to call forth expressions of pleasure from the officials, who for the most part were listening to Christian hymns for the first time. By request, the magistrate then made a short speech, in which he told the people not to think strangely of the new hospital as though it were some mysterious thing, but to regard it as an expression of love from the Christians in America to the suffering people of China. Mr. Eoyang, a graduate of the Methodist University at Nanking, who is teaching English in the Government School here, then presented in good literary style our motives for erecting such a building at Luh Hoh. Miss Holmes' personal teacher then read the story of the "Good Samaritan," after which we offered prayer. The service was concluded by another hymn. We retired to the tea cups again for another moment and then escorted the guests over the building.

As the next day was monthly meeting, the congregation met at the hospital chapel, where we were able in an official capacity to dedicate the new building to the praise and glory of His name.

On the fifteenth the place was again thrown open for the inspection of the ladies. Miss Holmes, with the Bible-women, assisted Mrs. De Vol in receiving the crowds of women and children who availed themselves of this opportunity of visiting the hospital.

The first in-patient was a young woman, a great sufferer from asthma. She came from one of the best families, her father being the "head man" of the city. She came to us at this time threatened with the loss of her sight. There was something of a risk attached to taking in a case, especially a first patient, who might go out totally blind, but having admitted her, we gave ourselves to prayer and made every possible effort to save her eyes. After two weeks her condition was so improved that she asked to go home. She had been home, however, less than twenty-four hours when she was seized with a violent attack of asthma. She hastened back and again readily responded to treatment. During her first stay with us, she took comparatively little interest in the Gospel, but now, with a grateful heart and an almost unlimited confidence in what we say, her interest is growing daily, and although she is intelligent beyond the average, her mind seems opening and her entire aspect seems changed. It was good of our blessed Master thus to set His seal upon the first fruit of our work.

We have already received several patients and have operated for the first time in the new operating room. It will be our pleasure from now on to tell you of our victories for Christ as we seek to utilize this opportunity to demonstrate His love as well as to preach it.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

MEDIA, PA., Fifth month, 2, 1907.

If some of thy readers are interested to know of the effort I have made to collect funds for the starving Russians and Chinese, I can report that $2,800 have come to me in aid of the former, and $2,600 for the latter, which amounts have been forwarded to Isaac Sharp, in London, and Long Sing Kow, in Shanghai, as they are in direct connection with the sufferers. Dr. Kennard has written a graphic statement of what he found in the famine-stricken districts in Russia, as the following extracts from his letter to the English Relief Committee will show, with the letter of Prince Loff to Edmund Wright Brooks:

"In China, thousands are dying daily. Some $500,000 have been forwarded from America, while $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 are needed to save those who must inevitably perish between this and the gathering of the summer crops.

"The Chinese Government has shown more interest than usual in its efforts to relieve the widespread suffering. Some $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 have been raised by the Chinese for this purpose.

"When we consider the many advantages we enjoy and that one dollar will save a life if promptly forwarded, these victims of poverty must appeal to our humanity."

If Friends, or any others, are still disposed to forward promptly to me what they wish to add to these funds, I will see that the money goes at once to the sufferers.

Thy friend,

JOS. ELKINTON,
18 West Street, Media, Pa.

Prince George Lvoff writes to Edmund Wright Brooks from Moscow, Third month 31, 1907:

"I have received again, through the Volga Kama Bank, the large sum of 33,495 roubles and wired you an acknowledgment.

"Your money did not remain unemployed for a single minute—I sent it immediately to the famine-stricken.

"Our situation is now very serious. Spring time always brings great difficulties. We must form stores of grain and other provision for two months.

"For want of roads, all communications are stopped, no means are left of earning bread by labor.

"The change from winter to spring is always a hard time for weakened people, but especially in such a famine year.

"We have no stores and cannot form them for want of money, which never was so scarce. . . . Just at this moment your money arrives and you can easily understand how welcome it is, and every penny is worth double now. For many localities we were obliged to close the refectories for want of means, and your money allows us to re-open them. You help especially the Ufa Province, which suffers particularly. . . . At the head of the organization stands an able and excellent man, Count Peter Petrovich Tolstoi. In each district central stores are formed, and authorized agents are chosen. In each village managers of the refectories are chosen from the peasants themselves, each refectory feeding 50 persons on an average, accounts are strictly kept in each refectory. The food of a man costs on an average 4.2 copeks, or a trifle more than a penny a day.

"We shall send you a regular account of the expenditure, which is controlled not only by our agents, but by the peasants themselves."

Dr. Kennard, when reporting to the Russian Famine Relief Committee of the Society of Friends in England, writes from the heart of the famine district (Samara), Fourth month 3, 1907:

"I feel bound to appeal at once to the British and American public to endeavor to make them understand what terrible want is here. If there be any who are wavering over the opening of their purses for the relief of the famine-stricken Russian people let them waver no longer, else it will be too late. . . . I came here to find that of the 3,000,000 people in the Province of Samara, 25 per cent. are starving, or 750,000. Of these the actual number receiving relief to-day are 372,700. The rest are dying by degrees, and even those who are in receipt of relief are but getting one meal in twenty-four hours. And what happens? Why those who have even this meagre food dealt out to them are invaded by their fellow-sufferers from far and wide and made to share it."

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

The Earlham College Y. M. C. A. has recently been refreshed by a two days' visit from the State Association secretary.

Prof. Elbert Russell recently gave a missionary address before the faculty and students of the Indiana State Normal School, at Terre Haute.

Mary H. Tebbetts, Whittier, Cal., is in very poor health. She has not been able to attend meeting for some months. Her patience and quiet Christian spirit are a benediction to many.

Pres. C. E. Tebbetts preached a missionary sermon at Whittier the 21st ult., at the close of which a subscription was taken for the mission in Alaska.

Elwood Mills has been attending the meeting at Bell, Cal., each First day since Harry Hayes went East. His services are very acceptable to the Friends there.

President Robert L. Kelly has accepted an invitation to give an address before the members of the Y. M. C. A. of the Indiana State University, Bloomington.

Amos Kenworthy has sold his home in Newberg and expects to locate with his family in Lake County, California. They will be greatly missed from Newberg, Ore.

Thomas Armstrong recently visited Friends at Imperial, Cal. He is very much encouraged about the work of the church there. They will soon request a monthly meeting.

William C. Allen has been liberated by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to visit London and Dublin Yearly Meeting; also Friends on the Continent, i. e., in Norway, Denmark and the south of France.

The second joint conference of the Ministerial Associations of Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings will be held at Greenfield, Ind., the 13th and 14th inst. The program is published elsewhere in this issue.

F. S. Blair, North Carolina, represented the Governor of the State, the State Sunday-school Association and the Peace Committee of the Yearly Meeting at the National Peace Congress recently held in New York City.

We have received a remittance of $2.00 from S. L. Harrison, Portland, Ore. This name does not appear on our mailing list, and letters sent to the address are returned. There is evidently an error somewhere. Can any of our subscribers help us to find it?

The Finance Committee of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia are soliciting contributions for their work for the coming year. If their means are sufficient they expect to send a contribution to aid the temperance forces in their fight for the adoption of the prohibitory clause in the proposed constitution for Oklahoma.

Edgar A. Wollam, pastor of the meeting at Tecumseh, Mich., accompanied his wife to Ohio to attend the funeral of her brother's wife, Mellie M. Brown, Raisin Center, Mich., and preached to the Friends at Tecumseh both morning and evening, the 28th ult., while the pastor was absent.

Prof. Wm. Orville Mendenhall, now an instructor of mathematics in Leland Stanford, Jr., University, has been elected to the chair of Pure Mathematics at Earlham College. He is a graduate of Penn College, and since his graduation has done advanced work at Haverford, the University of Chicago, and Clark University, where he held a Fellowship. He has had successful teaching experience in academy work, city high school work, college work, and university work.

A friend in Baltimore sends us a clipping from The Monitor, the official Catholic weekly of New Jersey, which gives an editorial on "Abolish the Oath in Courts of Law." From this we cull the following: "We are tempted to say that neither religion, justice nor charity is served by the administration of the oath in our society. Since its sanctity has departed, its benefit to justice and charity is at the most doubtful. Apart from the moral delinquencies its administration entails, even its utility has gone."

In our introductory note to the "Symposium on Plan for Proposed Missionary Union," we made this statement: "The following discussion is based upon a scheme drawn up by a committee appointed by the Missionary Conference, held at Richmond, Ind." We are now informed that the plan of union agreed upon at the Missionary Conference was the basis of the discussion, and that the plan we outlined is merely the scheme now being considered by the American Friends' Board of Foreign Missions as the next step in the movement.

An interesting meeting on Missions was given by the women of the congregation at Bloomingdale, Ind., Sabbath evening, the 28th ult. Emily Coleman, president of the W. F. M. S., presided; Sarah M. Woodard led the devotional exercises; Isabelle Newlin gave a "History of the Local Missionary Society;" Inez Woodard, "What the W. F. M. S. has Accomplished;" Martha N. Lindley, "Missions as a Church Movement Among Friends;" Inona Mitchell, "Methods of Mission Work in Other Churches;" "Mission Work in Mexico," Mary Pickett (who for seven years has been teaching in a mission-school at Victoria, Mexico, but who was called home on account of the critical illness of her mother); "Reflex Influence of Mission Work," Mary Ann Morris; Symposium, "How I became Interested in Mission Work," by members of the W. F. M. S.

The new meeting-house at South Wabash, Ind., was dedicated to the work and worship of God the 21st ult., Allen Jay, Richmond, Ind., preaching the dedicatory sermon from Romans 1:16. At the close of the sermon, $5,848.73 was raised, nearly $400 in excess of the indebtedness. The property complete cost somewhat in excess of $12,000. In the evening Daisy Barr, Fairmount, preached from the text, "What is That in 'Nine Hand?'" It was a stirring sermon, setting forth the peculiar message of Quakerism to the world of to-day. In addition to the ones mentioned, ministers from other meetings who attended the dedicatory services were Ira C. Johnson, Lynn, Ind., yearly meeting superintendent; Tennyson Lewis, Van Wert, Ohio, under whose pastorate plans were begun for the erection of the building, and George W. Willis, Cleveland, Ohio, who, with the assistance of the pastor, Levi T. Pennington, began a series of meetings, which are now in progress, and in which the church is being built up and souls saved.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Hesper (Kansas) Quarterly Meeting held a convention at Hesper Fourth month 20th and 21st. One who has never attended a convention has no idea of the enthusiasm and inspiration which attends even the smallest of such gatherings. Not one of the 25 delegates to Hesper but will testify to the help and encouragement gained at this first meeting of the kind in the quarter. An address by Jesse I. Phillips, on "Why an Endeavorer?" and one by J. D. Mills, on "What is C. E. Loyalty?" papers by the delegates on live questions in C. E. work, and special music from different quarters filled the program with good things. Much interest was centered on such questions as "The Progress of the C. E. Movement," "The Place of the C. E. Pledge," "Why is the Prayer-meeting Committee the Most Important Committee, and When are Its Duties Performed?" "Why is the Lookout Committee the Most Important Committee, and When are Its Duties Performed?" "What are the Duties and Possibilities of the Social Committee?" "Our Work in Foreign Fields," "Christian Endeavor Study Classes," and finally, "What Should We as Christian Endeavorers Expect to Accomplish Upon Our Return Home, Both for Our Societies and for Our Quarterly Meeting?"

It would be impossible to put on paper the many new ideas gained, and especially the enthusiasm felt at the sessions of the convention. We can only suggest that other quarterly meetings try it. The plan is worth while.

We clip the following from the Mt. Airy (N. C.) News of the 18th ult.: "The Friends of this city dedicated their new house of worship last Sunday. John L. Kittrell, Farmland, Ind., preached the sermon. The large audience listened with rapt attention to the end. The new building was commenced about three years ago and is of Mt. Airy granite, and was erected at a cost of about $3,500. The church now has a membership of 100, and is rapidly growing stronger. It numbers among its members some of the largest property-holders in the city, and has a loyal and earnest membership. T. W. Wooten is the pastor, and is a faithful and consecrated servant for the Master." In this connection, it is worth while to note a short historical sketch of Friends in this part of the old North State, written by John L. Worth, a Bible-school teacher in the Mt. Airy Meeting: "The Friends were quite numerous in North Carolina by the year 1800. The Westfield meeting grounds were granted to Elias Carr in 1797, and a flourishing meeting was kept up until about the year 1835, when almost the entire membership moved to Indiana and formed a new meeting and named it Westfield. After this date no meeting was regularly kept alive until about the year 1868, when old Westfield was renewed, and from it have sprung up White Plains, Mount Airy and Pine Hill, together with some Mission work in other places. The Mount Airy Meeting was organized Fifth month 21, 1898, and worshipped in various places in town until the church was built in 1904." Much credit for this revival is due to the faithful efforts of Leverett J. Rugg and wife, now of Macedon, N. Y.

The Friends of West Branch appointed a committee several months ago to make arrangements for celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the establishment of West Branch Monthly Meeting, which is the oldest monthly meeting in the present Indiana Yearly Meeting. The meeting was established First month 17, 1807. The time set for the centennial exercises is the 11th and 12th of Tenth month, 1907. Anna May Pemberton, West Milton, Ohio, is chairman of the committee, and Dr. Herbert R. Pearson, West Milton, is secretary.

Nannie M. Arnold attended the meeting at Lowell, Cal., both morning and evening, on the 14th ult.

The annual reports from the standing committees of Whittier Monthly Meeting, Cal., were given the 10th ult. A large number of the congregation were present, and enjoyed the very interesting accounts of the work. The financial report showed that $3,839 had been expended during the year. A bountiful supper was served in the basement at 6.30 o'clock, and the social hour gave an opportunity to become better acquainted with each other and to introduce the strangers.

Near the close of the business session the pastor, W. Mahlon Perry, cheered the hearts of those present by giving in his interesting and enthusiastic way a view of the bright side of the work of Friends in California. He thought in these days many were too much inclined to see the dark and gloomy in this world. If the whole church could have more of his kind of preaching we would perhaps accomplish more for the Master.

The Faculty of Haverford College find time to make themselves useful outside their regular school work, as will appear from the following:

Since the Christmas holidays, President Sharpless has made some 20 addresses other than those given before the student body at the college. They include addresses before literary and historical societies, teachers' institutes, etc.

Dr. Babbitt will take an active part in the meetings of two medical societies in Fifth and Sixth month, one paper treating the "Pathology of the Tonsil." He has also been reappointed on the Foot-ball Rules Committee.

Professor Thomas, by invitation, read a paper on "John Hancock, the Man and Patriot," before the Empire State Society, Sons of the American Revolution, in New York City, Third month 19th. The paper will be printed by the Society.

Dr. Bolles has in press a work on the modern law of banking. It is expected out this month. For several years he has been engaged in its preparation. The work is intended to be an exposition of all the important principles relating to State and National banking.

Professor Mustard gave an illustrated lecture before the Pennsylvania Society of the Archæological Institute of America, Third month 23d. This lecture represents some results of recent travels in southern Europe, and is entitled "Roman Remains in Southern France." It will be repeated later before similar organizations in New York, Baltimore and Washington.

In the March number of The Atlantic Monthly, Professor Comfort has an article on "Modern Spanish Fiction." The article is one of three, by different authors, presenting the political and religious problems confronting present-day Spain.

We have just received the following from Guilford College:

The college was pleased to have a short visit on the 26th ult. from Dr. W. W. Comfort, of Haverford College, who gave an interesting address to the students and others assembled in Memorial Hall, at 1.30 P. M. Dr. Comfort's presence and speech were highly acceptable to both students and Faculty.

Five Haverford alumni accompanied Dr. Comfort and Howard Lowry to Winston-Salem, to attend on the evening of the 26th ult. a banquet given to Haverfordians by W. A. Blair and wife.

Professor Thomas Newlin, the Dean, last week gave an educational address at the closing exercises of Corinth Academy in Virginia.

On the evening of the 7th ult. the Henry Clay Literary Society held its twenty-first annual oratorical contest. Five orations were delivered by young men chosen to represent the Society, all of whom made good speeches. The gold medal awarded on these occasions for the best oratory was won by Richard J. M. Hobbs, a Sophomore, who spoke on the "Problem of War."

The work on the girls' dormitory was begun last week, and the building will be open for girls in the fall. This prospect of increased accommodation for girls gives great delight to the Girls' Aid Committee of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, which for sixteen years has carried a concern for the education of girls.

The commencement exercises will be given on the 25th of Fifth month. On the 26th Robert E. Pretlow, Brooklyn, N. Y., is expected to attend the meeting for worship at 11 o'clock.

On the 29th—Commencement Day—Speaker Joseph G. Cannon will be present and make an address. Speaker Cannon will visit the college as a friend of the work which is being done here, desiring also to return to the spot which gave him birth. He, with his parents, left this community when he was four years old, and has not returned to the State since.

Dr. F. P. Venable, the president of the University of North Carolina, will also attend the commencement and make the address to the graduating class.

The following communication has just been received from a correspondent at Long Beach, Cal.: "It might be interesting to some of your many readers, especially some who may have returned to their homes from a visit to the coast, to read a brief account of Pasadena Quarterly Meeting, which convened at 10 o'clock to-day at Los Angeles. Seldom, indeed if ever, have we witnessed such power at a quarterly meeting, or such timely successful pleading for unity as was manifest at our morning meeting, showing clearly the blessed leading of the Holy Spirit. Two powerful prayers opened the way for two powerful sermons. The first by our own well-beloved pastor, Andrew F. Mitchel, given from the text found in I Corinthians 1-12, "Now this I say that every one of you saith I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ." and oh! what a sermon! finding a lodgment apparently in every anxious heart of the entire congregation, perhaps without a single exception. Without even a second's intermission, Pasadena's able minister, Harry Keats, followed with marked and unusual harmony on the same line, clinching with power by additional truths the spiritual application of the speaker preceding him. The effect and power of these two sermons were clearly felt as a guiding influence throughout in the transactions of the entire business of the day. At 12.15 we were invited to the basement, where all enjoyed the hospitality of the Los Angeles Friends in the form of a well-served and sumptuous lunch. At 1.45 the business session convened. In this part of the meeting, time was very appropriately occupied by expressions of love and respect contributed to the memory of Amos Sanders, late pastor at Los Angeles, and Dr. Aaron Talbert, Pasadena. A committee was appointed to prepare suitable memorials in their behalf for the yearly meeting's Permanent Board. A request for a monthly meeting at Imperial, Cal., was granted, making two monthly meetings set up in our quarter this year—Bethel Monthly Meeting, East Long Beach, and Alamo Monthly Meeting, Imperial, Cal. Both of these requests came through petitions from Long Beach Meeting. Yet, through the able and inspiring ministry of Brother Mitchell, we suffer no loss numerically, while the growth in unity and spirituality has indeed been marvelous, for which we are truly grateful. Perhaps another evidence of spiritual life and consecration is that for the first time in all our history, the Finance Committee has not had to make a single appeal for funds during the last year, either for the pastoral or general fund."

Events and Comments.

In Second month we were enjoying the hottest weather on record for that time of the year; nor have we ceased to have a good supply of weather novelties, since several snow storms visited our middle Atlantic States last week. Eight inches of snow fell in Chicago on the 3d inst., and snows of varying depth extended as far south as Texas.

What promises to be a strike of considerable importance, which may tie up building operations in and about Philadelphia, was started last week when the Brotherhood Carpenters struck and the Master Bricklayers declared a general lock-out. The unions of the build-ings' trades may join the strikers, and if this is done 30,000 men will become idle.

The Good Citizenship League and the Ministerial Association of Atlantic City have been conducting a vigorous fight for a "dry city" on First days. They have finally succeeded in enlisting the city officials on their side, and in securing promises from the license holders to close their bars on First days, and also to observe a universal closing hour; that is, 2 o'clock A. M. for the other days of the week.

The coffin-shaped mounds which have marked the place of graves for many years are about to pass. Many of our modern cemeteries are to be kept as "grassy lawns," with tombstones as the only mark for graves. This makes the grounds more beautiful and inexpensive to keep. Nearly all the cemeteries in New York less than twenty years old

TRAINED NURSE

REMARKS ABOUT NOURISHING FOOD.

"A physician's wife gave me a package of Grape-Nuts one day, with the remark that she was sure I would find the food very beneficial, both for my own use and for my patients. I was particularly attracted to the food, as at that time the weather was very hot and I appreciated the fact that Grape-Nuts requires no cooking.

"The food was deliciously crisp, and most inviting to the appetite. After making use of it twice a day for three or four weeks, I discovered that it was a most wonderful invigorator. I used to suffer greatly from exhaustion, headaches and depression of spirits. My work had been very trying at times and indigestion had set in.

"Now I am always well and ready for any amount of work, have an abundance of active energy, cheerfulness and mental poise. I have proved to my entire satisfaction that this change has been brought about by Grape-Nuts food.

"The fact that it is pre-digested is a very desirable feature. I have had many remarkable results in feeding Grape-Nuts to my patients, and I cannot speak too highly of the food. My friends constantly comment on the change in my appearance. I have gained 9 pounds since beginning the use of this food." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

have decided to introduce the reform method.

Former U. S. Senator John F. Dryden has returned to Newark fully recovered from the illness which prompted him to withdraw from the Senatorial contest, and has actively resumed business relations. When asked for an expression of opinion as to the effect of radical insurance legislation enacted by the different States during the past few months, Senator Dryden said:

"There has been much new legislation upon the subject of life insurance, and many important measures have been passed, while many others are still pending. While it is too early to forecast the future effect of the new laws, the Prudential may be relied upon to meet the situation in a spirit of the utmost fairness. Not only has the company always done what is legally required to do, but it has gone far beyond the mere letter of the law, and in the most liberal spirit has extended to the policyholders the privileges and advantages of one concession after another. In other words, the company has always tried to do more than the law required, and it may be relied upon to continue so to do. In its final analysis statute requirements, at the best, are a declaration of a broad and general principle of administration, and in the execution of details a successful company must necessarily be governed by a higher law than a statute—a moral obligation which calls for the most liberal treatment of the insured, compatible with safety.

"In pursuance of this policy, it has been my pleasure to sign an order in conformity with a resolution passed by the Board of Directors of the Prudential Insurance Company granting concessions this year to industrial policyholders in the Prudential who have attained the age of seventy-five years, which will result in relieving holders of a great many thousands of policies from the payment of any further premiums, costing the company over $750,000, and a continuance of this policy during the next ten years, it is estimated, over $3,250,000. These concessions, I understand, will affect proportionately more policies than a similar change in any other industrial insurance company. Other voluntary concessions in the form of increased benefits, cash and mortuary dividends, more liberal paid-up policies, etc. not called for by law or contract, have been made, aggregating over $8,000,000, and this large amount will be necessarily greatly added to in the future."

NOTICE.

Friends' Freedmen's Association is preparing to send boxes of clothing, shoes, etc., to their Industrial School at Christiansburg. Those who were present at the annual meeting heard the plea that the treasurer made for active, interested assistance. Excellent use is made of all that is sent, and we have no more worthy recipients of our aid. It is hoped that friends will respond liberally. All packages should be at Friends' Institute, 20 South Twelfth Street, not later than Fifth month 9th, plainly marked "For Christiansburg."

Housekeepers must be watchful, for great efforts are made to sell the alum baking powders which every physician will inform you are poisonous to the human system.

The Government Report shows Royal Baking Powder to be an absolutely pure and healthful cream of tartar baking powder, and consumers who are prudent will make sure that no other enters into their food.

ST. PAUL PARK INCIDENT.

"After drinking coffee for breakfast I always felt languid and dull, having no ambition to get to my morning duties. Then in about an hour or so a weak, nervous derangement of the heart and stomach would come over me with such force I would frequently have to lie down.

"At other times I had severe headaches; stomach finally became affected and digestion so impaired that I had serious chronic dyspepsia and constipation. A lady, for many years State President of the W. C. T. U., told me she had been greatly benefited by quitting coffee and using Postum Food Coffee; she was troubled for years with asthma. She said it was no cross to quit coffee when she found she could have as delicious an article as Postum.

"Another lady, who had been troubled with chronic dyspepsia for years, found immediate relief on ceasing coffee, and beginning Postum twice a day. She was wholly cured. Still another friend told me that Postum Food Coffee was a Godsend to her, her heart trouble having been relieved after leaving off coffee and taking on Postum.

"So many such cases came to my notice that I concluded coffee was the cause of my trouble and I quit and took up Postum. I am more than pleased to say that my days of trouble have disappeared. I am well and happy." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

MORE BOXES OF GOLD

AND MANY GREENBACKS.

Three hundred and twenty-five boxes of Gold and Greenbacks will be sent to persons who write the most interesting and truthful letters of experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee-drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum.

2. Give name and account of one or more coffee-drinkers who have been hurt by it and have been induced to quit and use Postum.

3. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

4. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make it clear, black, and with a snappy, rich taste?

5. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonfuls to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, and beginning at that time when actual boiling starts, boil full 15 minutes more to extract the flavor and food value. (A piece of butter the size of a pea will prevent boiling over.) This contest is confined to those who have used Postum prior to the date of this advertisement.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Contest will close June 1st, 1907, and no letters received after that date will be admitted. Examinations of letters will be made by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd. Their decisions will be fair and final, and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five writers of the most interesting letters, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition, and in the best kind of a cause, and costs the competitors absolutely nothing.

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

STRIVE, WAIT, PRAY.

"Strive; yet I do not promise
The prize you dream of to-day
Will not fade when you think to grasp it,
And melt in your hand away;
But another and holier treasure,
You would now perchance disdain,
Will come when your toil is over
And pay you for all your pain.

"Wait; yet I do not tell you
The hour you long for now
Will not come with its radiance vanished,
And a shadow upon its brow;
Yet far through the misty future
With a crown of starry light,
An hour of joy you know not
Is winging her silent flight.

"Pray; though the gift you ask for May never comfort your fears,
May never repay your pleading,
Yet pray, and with hopeful tears;
An answer not that you long for,
But diviner, will come one day;
Your eyes are too dim to see it,
Yet strive, and wait, and pray."

The Spanish people are rejoicing over the birth of an heir to the throne. The young prince made his appearance on the 10th inst.

New York City is to have milk stations in the public parks, so that safe milk for babies and children can be easily secured during the hot weather.

An interesting social experiment was inaugurated last week at Hampstead, England, when the first sod was cut out of the Hampstead garden suburb, a co-operative project for building ideal homes for working people. The houses are kept in common ownership and the tenants are taken as shareholders in the society, paying by easy installments, all surplus profits to go to tenant members. Open spaces are left for common playgrounds, and much care has been taken in planning the area.

The anticocaine bill seems likely to go through the New York Legislature in its original stringent form, making it a felony to sell the drug except by prescription. There can be no question that strong measures are needed. Within a very few years the cocaine habit has increased prodigiously, and it is perhaps even worse than the use of morphine. There is little hope for the victim when once the system has become habituated to the drug. It marks the last downward stage. The sale of destructive drugs, as well as the sale of poisons, cannot be too carefully supervised.

John Watson, better known as Ian Maclaren, died at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, from blood poisoning, the 6th inst. Dr. Watson's books, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," "The Doctor of the Old School," and others, have had a wide reading in America. He was well beloved as a minister in the Presbyterian Church, and was popular as a lecturer. He delivered three lectures at Haverford College this spring, while sojourning in the East. He was traveling and lecturing in the West at the time he was taken ill. He died very suddenly, before a specialist from Chicago could be summoned to his relief.

In wrestling with its milk problem, London has tried the device of using paper bottles, which are to be destroyed immediately after being used. These quart and pint bottles of paper are sealed when they are filled, so that nothing can get into them before they are delivered to the consumer. The object is to get rid of the dangers presented by cans and bottles which are neglected and not properly cleansed and sterilized by the dealers. Similar efforts are being made by some concerns in the United States. If a paper bottle can be made cheap enough, there ought to be a big opening for their production.

Denver, Colorado, has been having a period of spring cleaning. Mayor Spear named three days in which the citizens were expected to make their premises clean and attractive, and see to it that the streets were freed from dirt. Denver's example has been followed in Colorado Springs and other cities of that State. Chicago tried the experiment or calling for a united effort on the part of all its citizens to spend one day cleaning the city. The success of the effort is quite satisfactory. It is not likely that these special efforts are an index of what the citizens are likely to maintain; but they do make a city look much cleaner, and the practice of an occasional city "clean-up" would be a worthy undertaking for the American people.

The Commissioners of Morgan County, Indiana, have taken an advance step in dealing with the liquor situation in their county. Acting in accordance with the opinions of Judges Artman and Christian, they have refused to grant licenses, on the ground that the saloon is a public nuisance. When application was made for two saloons in the Third Ward of Martinsville, Ind., one of the commissioners moved that "inasmuch as it was the understanding and opinion of the board that a saloon is a public nuisance, and that there was a remonstrance on file the board was without authority of law or morals to grant a license to sell intoxicating liquors, and, further, that if anyone should grant a license to sell intoxicants in Morgan County, it should be the Circuit Court, and not the Board of Commissioners." This motion was sustained by the other two members. In this action the Commissioners were upheld by the County Attorney.

Much interest has centered in the House of Commons during the past week, the result of the introduction of the Government's Irish bill. Augustine Birrell, chief secretary for Ireland, presented the measure, and stands as a champion for its adoption. The bill does not seem to meet with very hearty support, since it is too much of a compromise to suit either of the two extreme parties. It does not affect the Parliamentary union and does not diminish the authority of the Crown in Ireland. What it does is to give to Irish representatives opportunity of administrative activity in local government. The Administrative Council, partly appointed but mainly elected by the present constituencies, is to be divided into departments having jurisdiction over local affairs, education, agriculture, public works, and so on, subject to the veto of the Lord Lieutenant; the judiciary, the police, and the Land Commission remain under imperial control. There is, in short, no political independence provided in this measure but it provides for the establishment of much of the essential machinery of self-government, with the expectation of thus "paving the way" for more complete home rule hereafter.

HANG ON

COFFEE TOPERS AS BAD AS OTHERS.

"A friend of our family who lived with us a short time was a great coffee drinker and a continual sufferer with dyspepsia. He admitted that coffee disagreed with him, but you know how the coffee drinker will hold on to his coffee, even if he knows it causes dyspepsia.

"One day he said to me that Postum Food Coffee had been recommended and suggested that he would like very much to try it. I secured a package and made it strictly according to directions. He was delighted with the new beverage, as was every one of our family. He became very fond of it, and in a short time his dyspepsia disappeared. He continued using the Postum, and in about three months gained twelve pounds.

"My husband is a practicing physician and regards Postum as the healthiest of all beverages. He never drinks coffee, but is very fond of Postum. In fact, all of our family are, and we never think of drinking coffee any more." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

WHAT IS SPIRITUALITY?

Few words in our language are used more loosely than the word spiritual. We often hear two absolutely opposite verdicts on some sermon, or on some book, or article: "I did enjoy it, it was so 'spiritual;'" and "I did not care much for it, it lacked 'spirituality!'" How are these two verdicts possible upon the same sermon, book or article? They are possible because those who pass such judgments are using wholly different standards—they have different "foot-rules" to measure by.

You see something similar happen in the more ordinary affairs of life. We see a man running and we say, "How fast he is going!" but another person, comparing him with an automobile, says, "How slow that man is!" We are astonished at the swiftness of an express train, but the person who compares its speed with that of electricity or light, says, "What a slow-coach the Pullman car is after all!"

In the same way the many conclusions about "spirituality" are due to different standards of life, diverse points of comparison, and varying stages of personal experience. There are as many possible standards of "spirituality" as there are of speed; and when we differ in our verdict, it is because we are passing judgment from different levels of experience and different points of view. With some persons a peculiar tone of voice—a nasal twang, or a monotonous sing-song—has special "unction" and is peculiarly "spiritual." With others a rapturous flow of words, not premeditated, and unmistakably not intellectual, is considered spiritual. Some think anything "spiritual," if it stirs their diaphragm and gives them a sudden emotion. For others the test of the "spiritual" is found in the acceptance and use of "sacred" phrases and doctrinal shibboleths, though the same truths expressed in different form and language would be pronounced "unspiritual." The word "spiritual" has been used by hosts of persons, in all generations, for any experience that is accomplished by ecstatic feeling—for any experience that goes beyond the normal powers of our human nature. In short, the prevailing popular view is probably still not much different from the old Roman Catholic view that "states" mysteriously, magically produced are "spiritual," and that a man is most "spiritual" when he is least himself. Now there is over against this, a somewhat different view of what is meant by the "spiritual," a view which has been steadily growing ever since the Reformation, a view championed by Luther himself, a view which found noble expression in the pillar Friends of the seventeenth century, a view which has now become a part of the necessary air we breathe in the growing religious faith of to-day. This view holds that God is not off in some world other than this world we live in. He is here as much as the air we breathe or the food we eat is here. Every act of our spirits by which we coöperate with the Divine Spirit toward a larger and holier life is "spiritual." As Luther himself taught: Nothing which is inherently good in itself is foreign to religion, and nothing which is not already intrinsically good can be made so by calling it religious. The test, then, by which we decide whether an exercise is "spiritual" or not will always be found in its practical effect, its transforming power, or as Paul, who held this view, puts it: that is "spiritual" which edifies and constructs—that which "perfects saints and builds up the whole body of Christ."

Many things stir the diaphragm with emotional thrills which do not at all construct a holy life or minister to a better human society. Many things may be uttered in the nasal twang and sing-song tone which do nothing to "perfect saints." There are plenty of "ecstatic feelings" which do not, in the least, "build up the body of Christ," and in so far as these states and experiences fail on this test they lose their right to be called "spiritual." The quiet word, uttered in simple, natural voice, which kindles holier aspiration and sends the listener out to his daily tasks with purer vision and higher faith is more "spiritual" than trances and more "spiritual," too, than ecstatic utterance which leaves everybody perplexed and mystified. We are coming to realize, and some day everybody will realize, that God is working in infinite ways to reach our finite lives, that His influences are not confined to a few holy places, a few sacramental performances, a few types of ministry, to a few sacred times and seasons, but that every way which brings the soul into a larger place and into a holier life is a Divine way of coming to God and, therefore, "spiritual." R. M. J.

THE SPIRITUAL TRANSCENDS.

Judging from communications which reach this office and from talks heard in religious gatherings, we are constrained to believe there are many among us who think that the "Kingdom of Nature" is necessarily distinct from the "Kingdom of Heaven." Things natural and things spiritual are regarded as antagonistic, and consequently it is necessary to remove the one in order to possess the other. A recent communication informs us that this dualistic conception is the fundamental principle of right Christian thinking. It separates the "Divine" and the "human" in order that "spiritual inspiration" cannot be confounded with genius, intuition, or any other "natural power." Thus stated, the philosophy is taking and many good people accept it as true.

We share the feeling which would magnify the spiritual and make it supreme over the natural. All of us who have a clear consciousness of the new birth know the transcendent importance of "spiritual inspiration," but all the more are we constrained to protest against a dualistic conception of the world, which relegates part of God's universe to the dump heap, and tells us that one set of His laws are irreconcilable with another. This dualism played havoc with the early Church and has caused untold mischief ever since. It took the warm life of Christian love, which the world needed so much, and buried it in caves and cloister and convents. The brain and brawn, which should have been developed to their highest in making the "Kingdom of Nature" and the "Kingdom of Heaven" one, was neglected, despised and often regarded as evil. Strange, is it not, that such a philosophy should be promulgated as Christianity?

But this is only the beginning of error for those who are consistent with the theory. "Christ so emptied Himself," we are told, "when He became His Father's messenger that He said, 'My teaching is not Mine, but His that sent Me,'" and the same writer continues speaking of any one who so empties himself, "such a preacher will speak 'as one with authority', as his Master did. A 'thus saith the Lord' will be in his heart." This is the only conclusion which the premises warrant, but it is a conclusion that is exceedingly dangerous to sane and true Christian living. It is the conception on which the infallibility of James Naylor, Joseph Smith, and Alexander Dowie rests. When men get to be simply speaking tubes for the Almighty, it is time they were asking themselves whether or no there is not something the matter with their philosophy.

We believe that all our natural powers should be made servants of righteousness. We do this by making His will our will. But we are men, and will remain so as long as we stay in this world. Try the best we can with our eyes fixed on the heavenly goal, our work will always bear the stamp of our individuality; it will be influenced by our training, shaped by our environment, and filled with the imperfections of our short comings. The best we can hope for as a race is that which bears the stamp of the Divine and the human in one.

The halting steps and the imperfect work of loving Christians cannot always be attributed to unfaithfulness. We have many limitations, physical and mental, which properly belong to us as individuals. They are occasions for much error and misunderstanding, but they are part of God's scheme and are necessary for growth. The Father looks with mercy and pity upon His erring children, and accepts them not because they have been perfect, automatic machines, but for their honest, faithful efforts, and sincere love for Him.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE PART OF WOMAN IN ORGANIZATION OF THE EARLY FRIENDS.

BY EDITH BETTLE.

At first glance over the references available it would seem that this subject might be summed up as concisely as the chapter on "Snakes" in a certain History of Ireland, for there are very few places in the writings of early Friends which treat of this matter, and what references exist are, in most cases, very brief and refer to women's meetings as established facts, rather than to their history and doings.

But, although passages in regard to women's part in the early days of our Society are few and meagre, one able to read between the lines the full story of their works and sacrifices would doubtless find that their labors were important and full of human usefulness, even though put forth less for the Society than for individuals. The first occasion for women's meetings was to care for those suffering imprisonment for the Faith and to supply their needs. And it was no light nor easily-performed duty, in those rude times, for a gentle Quakeress to present herself at the prison gates craving admission of a rough jailer, in order to minister to one of a despised sect; and there were times when those bringing help to their fellow-members in prison ran no little risk of being, themselves, arrested and incarcerated.

Sewel's History says that, when the "People called Quakers so increased in London that they began to have settled meetings, the first of these was held at the house of one Sarah Sawyer," in 1654. From this time the number of Friends in London increasing, several other meetings were started, "until the Church became so great that a house, known by the name of the Bull and Mouth, was hired for a meeting-house, and, it being a building that had belonged to some great man, there was a large hall in it that would hold many people, and so was very convenient for a meeting-place."

The mention of this historic building, with its picturesque, if misleading, name brings us in touch with the very beginnings of women's meetings. William Crouch, after telling of "certain ancient men Friends about the City of London" meeting together in an upper room of this building to consider the affairs of Truth, continues thus: "And now also some ancient women Friends did meet together to consider of what appertained to them as their most immediate care and concern, to inspect the circumstances and conditions of such who were imprisoned on Truth's account, and to provide things needful to supply their wants; and what did or might more immediately concern men Friends, the women would acquaint them therewith; and all was done in great love and unity—no jar nor discord amongst them—no repining nor murmuring; but a sweet harmony and agreement was preserved in all things. These women did also inquire into and inspect the wants and necessities of the poor, who were convinced of Truth; and they sat not still until the cry of the poor came to their houses; but when they did suppose or discover a want of help, their charity led them to inquire into their conditions and to minister to their necessities. And thus things were carried on with cheerfulness and brotherly kindness, in the infancy of the Church; all whisperings and backbitings were shut out, and love and good will to all promoted and cherished. And afterwards, as Truth grew and prospered, and many came to be added to the faith, the meetings came through the providence of God, to be settled in order and method, as at this day."

The care of the poor as the object and cause of women's meetings is told in an interesting document, signed by Edward Burroughs, under date 1662. It is a testimony concerning the beginnings of our Society's work and teaching in London, and, setting forth certain injunctions for carrying on the work, enjoins, sixthly, "that especial care be taken concerning provision for the poor that believe and profess the Truth." "And that the meeting of women Friends be assisting to help" . . . "particularly in this case," for which end that meeting had been appointed "some years after the first appointment of the men's meeting." . . .

By this, we see that women's meetings were of later origin than the men's meetings, and their raison d'être the necessities of the prisoners of the Quaker faith, and of the poor and sick—also that they were exercised only in this part of the Church's work, having no voice in the governing of the Society, nor recognized standing in this respect.

It is to be hoped that my readers resemble the Bellman's crew, who "were all of them fond of quotations;" for we have already had several, and more follow.

In 1674, the women Friends in London wrote an epistle addressed to "the women Friends in the country, also elsewhere, about the service of a women's meeting" for the information and encouragement of their rural sisters, and to stir them up into like diligence. The services of their own meeting were, in brief, as follows: to visit and care for their sick and for prisoners, for the aged and weak, for widows, and to take care of "poor orphans" for their "education and bringing up in good nurture and in fear of the Lord, and putting them out to trades in the wholesome order of creation." Also—heralds of the dawn of overseers—"elder women exhorting the younger in all sobriety, modesty in apparel, and subjection to Truth;" "and to stop tattlers and false reports, and all such things as tend to division amongst us."

"Also admonishing such maids and widows as may be in danger through the snare of the enemy either to marry with unbelievers or to go to the priest to be married. . . . And that maid servants that profess Truth and want places be orderly disposed of . . . and, likewise, that the serious life and good order of Truth be minded between mistresses and maids." For the carrying out of these various duties, meetings were held every Second-day "to communicate each to the other the several necessities, that none may be idle . . . for our services still increase many ways, but chiefly our work is to help the helpless in all cases according to our abilities." This epistle further declares that although their provision is more especially set apart "for the supply of the household of Faith," yet, as "the Lord maketh the sun to rise on the good and bad and sendeth his rain on the just and unjust, so the same bounty, according to its measure in us, oftentimes finds the same object of charity which we cannot (as we find freedom) send empty away." Do we see here the beginning of the Dorcas Society, Houses of Industry, Ante-Diluvian, and other charitable efforts of our times for those not of the membership?

But specific instances make work like that of the women's meetings more real to us than the generalities of an epistle. In an expense account in a minute-book of women's meetings in Oxfordshire are the following entries: For the schooling of 2 children, 03 shillings; To a girl that led a blind friend, 02 pence; to the 2 poor maids at North Newton, 02 shillings; to Ann Parsons to buy her fowl, 1 shilling; and (prophetic of the House Committee), for 2 besoms 01 & 8, a broom, 2 pence. In this same minute-book is the record of the binding out of the daughter of a member for a term of four years, and—"shades of the Prison House" again—in minutes of 9, 6, 1682, it is ordered that "Ann Long should Disburst out of the stock for Friends that are prisoners at Northampton the sum of £2. 10.

That the use and need of women's meetings was felt by George Fox is shown again and again in his journal. He says more than once that he had been moved of the Lord to recommend the setting up of them. In 1672, George Fox wrote an epistle "to all women's meetings," exhorting the women to "keep their meetings in the power of God," and stating examples from the Bible of many different women who had done God's work and shown themselves helpmates with the men in this regard.

The entries in the journal during his travels in America speak of women's meetings in connection with the general meeting of Maryland, the half-yearly meeting at Oyster Bay, and Rhode Island Yearly Meetings, but say little more about them, except that the Rhode Island Meeting was large and very solemn.

Writing to Friends in Jamaica, he urges them to have a woman's meeting, "though there be but a few."

Another epistle relative to the station of women in the Church states instances from the Old Testament of women's assemblies and continues, "Now, Moses and Aaron and the 70 elders did not say to these assemblies of the women we can do our work ourselves, and you are fitter to be at home to wash the dishes, or such like expressions; but they did encourage them in the work and service of God" . . . and George Fox proceeds with like encouragement to the women of his day, saying that if the women of the old dispensation were suffered and encouraged, it is even more meet in this the day and time of Christ that they should know and do God's work and service about His heavenly tabernacle and sanctuary.

There was evidently much opposition to women's meetings in some quarters, for George Fox frequently speaks of contending with these recalcitrants. In the same epistle, last mentioned, he has many words for the confounding of such—for instance: "And now, you that stumble at women's meetings, had not your women many vain meetings before they were convinced, and you were not offended at them when they met to satisfy the flesh and had junketing meetings to themselves; did you reprove them for such meetings? And why should they not now meet in their conversion in the Lord's power and spirit, to do His business? But some have said that such meetings must not be, but as business requires or occasions them, as much as to say, you must not make up the hedges till the beasts have devoured your corn; and then the parish overseers must meet together to compute the damage." Also, in another epistle, he says: "Some of this Spirit have said to me, 'they see no service in women's meetings.' My answer to such is, and hath been to such, if they be blind and without sight, they should not oppose others, for none impose anything upon them."

At Slaughterford, in 1675, we find him again opposed by like short-sighted brethren. "Notwithstanding," he says, "the opposition was made at the meeting, yet a very good and serviceable meeting it was, for occasion was thereby administered to answer their objections and cavils and to open the services of women's meetings in and for the Church. At this meeting the women's meetings for that county were established in the blessed Power of God." Again, the next year, writing at Reading, he says: "Next day, there being another meeting about settling a women's meeting, some of those that had let in the spirit of division fell into jangling and were disorderly for a while till the weight of Truth brought them down." He seems here, as well as on another occasion, to have been enabled to "keep atop" of his opposers.

That the London Yearly Meeting realized the value of these meetings is seen in advices and epistles written in 1691, and from time to time after, in regard to the setting up and encouragement of the same, witness the following extract: "It is with real concern this meeting observes that, notwithstanding the establishing of women's meetings for discipline hath been strongly recommended by divers minutes of preceding yearly meetings and their services clearly set forth, yet a deficiency appears in sundry counties." Then follows an entreaty that this lack be supplied, "as it appears such meetings have been of great service to the Society in general, and to the youth in particular."

But, although it was thus early recognized that women's meetings were fitting and useful, to grant the women an active voice in affairs of the yearly meeting, at least, was quite a different matter. Since the time of George Fox a women's meeting had been held in London at the time of the yearly meeting, exercising a prescriptive rule in matters regarding the poor and charities, pertaining to their own sex; but in 1766, this meeting presented to the yearly meeting a written request to be constituted a meeting for discipline. This petition states the case; is duly signed by four members, then, womanlike, there follows: "P. S.—We desire your answer this evening, our meeting being adjourned on that account till tomorrow." The reply to this appeal was an evasion, putting off the answer till the ensuing year, with the recommendation that it should "remain weightily on the minds of Friends." The year having elapsed, the request was refused. It appearing to the committee appointed "after solid and deliberate consideration, that the women's meeting, held annually in London at the time of the yearly meeting, does not consist of women Friends regularly deputed from any other meetings, that the forming of such a meeting hath appeared to our predecessors, and it does to us, a matter of great difficulty. As, therefore, the meeting of a number of women Friends and of suitable abilities to carry on so weighty and important a work, appears to us very doubtful and uncertain, and cannot but subject the few who are qualified to assist in this work to great inconveniences, it is therefore our unanimous opinion, that the present is not the proper season for complying with the said proposal." To this definite report are affixed no less than 69 names.

In 1784, eighteen years later, another attempt is made, 9 women Friends under deputation from their meeting, accompanied by three others on a religious visit from America, laying before the yearly meeting the proposition that the women's meeting be authorized to correspond with the women's meeting of several counties and places already in correspondence with the yearly meeting. The yearly meeting, after weighty consideration, agrees to this, and states that it will be expedient that the said meeting be a meeting of record, and be denominated "the yearly meeting of women Friends held in London," "yet such meeting is not to be so far considered a meeting of discipline as to make rules, nor yet alter the present queries without concurrence of this meeting."

Finally, in 1790, the women's yearly meeting is given a representative constitution, by which the several quarterly meetings of women Friends were at liberty to appoint two or more of their members to meet in London at the time of the yearly meeting, the number so appointed, however, not to exceed that of representatives allowed to be appointed by the men's quarterly meetings for the same district. "Which meeting of women to be denominated the Yearly Meeting of Women Friends, held in London."

Further the women's quarterly meetings were advised to send to the yearly meeting answers in writing to the queries proposed to the women Friends. But said yearly meeting was not at liberty to make or alter any rules or discipline or queries.

HOLD WHAT YOU GET.

BY D. B. JUTTEN.

A short time ago I saw, in one of the streets of Boston, some workmen engaged in removing a portion of a once fair and vigorous tree. The tree was a forked one, having two large limbs standing high in the air. One of these was dead and decayed, and was liable to fall at any time, to the peril of any one passing beneath, and it was this one which the workmen designed to pull to the ground. The limb had been sawed through some distance above the sidewalk, a rope had been fastened to an upper branch, and the men, with the other end of the rope wound round another and somewhat distant tree, were pulling it steadily, while a man at the distant tree drew in and wound round the tree the slack of the rope. What interested me most was not the falling of the limb, but the repeated exhortation of the leader to the man at the tree to "hold what you get." Losing what he got would never bring the limb to the ground, but holding what he got surely would. The exhortation of the man at the tree is the exhortation of the Christian to his fellow. "Hold what you get." You have had a new and a deep religious experience. You have had clearer views of yourself, of truth and of duty. You have developed a stronger trust in God, and a firmer purpose to keep His commandments. Hold what you have gained. You have attended some religious meetings and have received a spiritual uplift and a new endowment of spiritual power. Hold what you have gained. Your new experience has lifted you to a higher level in your Christian life, from which you ought never to recede, but from which you should advance to higher spiritual attainment, to a larger and more unselfish service, and to a fuller conformity to the glorious image of Jesus Christ. Hold what you get.

THE QUAKER IDEA OF MUSIC IN ITS RELATION TO WORSHIP.

BY EDGAR L. REQUA.

Friends have said much about worship, little about music. I shall briefly state our theory of worship and devote the major portion of this paper to music and its relation to worship.

The Quaker idea of worship is the highest known. To worship in Spirit and in Truth is to present one's self before the Lord and wait upon Him. He is King of Kings and Lord of Lords. Hence, it becomes us, His subjects, to approach Him reverently, silently and await His will. It is His prerogative to speak first. It is the Lord which bids or moves to speak, pray, sing or take any outward part in worship. It was a mistake, however, to say how long this silence should last. It was an equal mistake to conclude that because a few Friends' meetings, in the beginning, had been held in silence, and all had felt the power of the Lord, that therefore all Friends' meetings should be silent meetings.

George Fox and his fellow-sufferers wisely concluded that the Protestant Reformation still needed reforming. Though many branches had been lopped off, the main tap-root of evil, will-worship, still remained full of life. They contended, and rightly so, that all worship, preaching, praying and singing must be in the Spirit, that is, led or inspired by the Spirit. Their meetings held on the basis of silence were as great a testimony to the world and as positive a witness against false religion as was their preaching. The world and the Quaker Church to-day have as much need of meetings of this kind as in the days of Cromwell.

In rejecting the outward forms, ceremonies and superstitions which had crept into the Church, they also rejected outward music. But even Friends have not escaped the law of extremes. It seems the pendulum has reached the other side. Instead of silent meetings, we seem afraid of silence. And, instead of music, we have all kinds of music. The question now arises, what is the place of music in our meetings, and what kind of music shall we have?

The Quaker idea of music is yet to be defined. For about two centuries we practiced a very one-sided interpretation of the text, "Singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord." (Eph. 5:19.)

When we "revived" and began to sing, the songs of the Wesley and Moody movements were used as solos, and then for congregational singing. To-day, we have choirs, orchestras, pianos, organs, and pipe-organs. We have music in variety—the worshipful hymn, the choir, medley and the ragtime ditties of our camp-meetings and Sunday-schools. The Quaker has ever stood for the best, the best in all things; the best in music is the Quaker idea. This paper is to be a general definition of that idea.

What is music? "Sounds that are pleasing to the ear." This definition is too general and inadequate.

Music, the oldest and youngest of the arts, is the most elusive and the most exacting. The most penetrating and the most evanescent. It is almost as indefinable as love. We can tell some of its laws and effects, but what it is, who shall say? It comes from silence. It moves about, upon and within us. It trembles away and becomes silence. It is very voice of silence.

Music is the art which employs sounds as the medium of expression. Music is the art of sensibility, because it regulates the phenomenon of vibration. It is mathematics eloquent. It is the melody of the spheres made manifest.

It is beyond the scope of a paper like this to discuss the origin of instrumental music. Most of the objections to instrumental music is based on the argument that it is the invention of sinful men; i. e., the Race of Cain (Gen. 4:21, 22). According to the same reasoning, the ability to build houses and to work metals is all of the devil. Such reasoning relegates us to a period before the Stone Age. We find that God directed His people to make musical instruments (Num. 10:2). The Temple had its great orchestra of instruments and its choir of trained voices. We read of musical instruments in Heaven. Since we find them in the God-ordained temple, which has passed away, and in Heaven, which is to last forever, and in our homes, who shall say that they are not legitimate in our churches? What kind? All kinds; a whole orchestra at our Gospel meetings. If we only have one instrument, have the best and the best is nothing more nor less than a first-class pipe-organ. The epidemic of pianos in churches will be short-lived. It is due to the popularity of unclassical music and to the manufacturing competition of an age which desires to produce something to sell, rather than to endure. Hence, I say the pipe-organ is the best, and the church that stops short of the pipe-organ has not attained the best.

Let me place before you a few facts relative to music. Music is one thing, musical instruments are another. Music is one thing, singing is another. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it.

The invention and extensive manufacture of the organ, piano, pianola, and phonograph have flooded this country with music—music cheap in every way. Europe says, the standard of music in America is a low one. I wish to show some of the causes of this and its effect upon church music, especially the kind that we have been having in the Friends' Church. Having mentioned the phonograph and other instruments, the next is the lack of a proper musical standard. Every man has been doing right, musically, in his own eyes. The result is musical anarchy.

There is the negro or Congo melody. This has had a much larger effect upon the popular and so-called sacred songs of this country than is commonly supposed. The negro came from the Congo (used as a general term for Africa), and in the heart of Africa still may be heard* the same type of music that one may hear, for instance, in New Orleans—and in some Friends' churches.

Another cause is the degeneracy of the American opera. The first opera in America was a financial failure. In order to make money, opera companies have catered, not to the highest, but often to the lowest in humanity. The people have generally been given something less than the best in music, frequently the worst.

As a result of these conditions, we have what is called popular or ragtime as opposed to sacred and classical music. Ragtime is well named, patched with anything. A jumble of time and melody. The sensual and the spiritual jostled side-by-side. The turmoil and strife of a sin-mad-world translated into music and we Quakers have attempted to praise the Lord with such stuff. And it is just commencing to be safe to say anything against it.

We Americans are awakening to the fact that our music is not only beneath us, but detrimental to us, and that it should appeal not to the worst but to the best within us. We are in the beginning of a revival of music. It is being felt everywhere. The opera, the public school, every denomination, and even the Quakers are awakening. When the Quakers awaken on music the world ought to listen, and it will. Instead of being the dumping ground for the cast-off music of others, we should be leaders in music; and in the stillness of our silence, hear the voice and message of music and proclaim it to the world.

It seemed needful to notice the musical condition of to-day in order to proceed intelligently. Permit me to lay down some axioms, for music is a science as well as an art.

1. Music is internal; it proceeds from and appeals to that which is within the realm of man's soul.

2. Music is pure and spiritual when it proceeds from and appeals to that which is pure and spiritual within.

3. Music is impure and sensual when it proceeds from and appeals to that which is impure and sensual in the human heart.

The widespread and almost universal popularity of rag-time music has been proof of this appalling fact—that as a nation we have been lacking in purity, in piety, and in true spirituality. Ruskin declares that he never saw a person ripe for heaven who had any interest in art. It should be equally true that the saint whose brow glows with the glory of the indwelling Christ should have no affinity for rag-time music.

There is a theory that rag-time music appeals to certain people because they are of a certain temperament, and that classical music appeals to others because they are of another temperament. This can not be substantiated by facts.

Music is composed of three elements—time or

*Some authorities claim that the "Congo" melody originally was Portuguese; they also claim that the "Congo" melody is not nor has it been found in Africa; but that it is the product of African slavery. But according to our missionaries, the negro in Africa to-day gives pretty good evidence that "Congo" music not only originated in Africa, but is natural to the Africans.

rythm; tune or melody; tone, timber, or color. Time or rythm in music gives it its active power. It is the rollocking motion of a jig which causes it to appeal to us in a certain way. It awakens certain vibrations and emotions within us. The trumpet call to battle, the march of the brass-band, the worshipful hymn of the organ, each awakens a different set of vibrations and emotions within us and produces its effect. The barbarian goes into ecstasy over the time or rythm of the tom-tom or drum. The effect of rythm upon animals is marked. Fowls will shake their heads as if in pain at certain sounds. The effect upon dogs is well known. Rythm in music acts upon the muscular system and has been known to cause convulsions as well as soothe the savage breast.

Permit me to lay down the following statements as to the effect of music:

1. In proportion as a man is ignorant of or uneducated in music and unspiritual in religion, the primitive; i. e., mere rythm in music appeals to him.

2. In proportion as a man is educated in music and spiritual in religion, he demands more—he demands tune and tone.

Will not the above statements explain why some very staid Friends have preferred a jig to a hymn or a horn-pipe to a chant?

Less than twenty years ago, a musician visited the Hopi Indians of Arizona and listened to their music. He pronounced it wonderful. In the minor keys, as most of nature's melodies are, and also in the major, they seemed to combine the rich, solemn beauty of the Gregorian Chant with the free, lofty music of Italy. The purity of the primitive Indian life, the spirituality of their religion and their nearness to nature account for such music.

It is a crime against humanity that this music has not been recorded and thus preserved. We need more of the Indian chant and less of the Congo ditty in our hymn music in the Quaker churches.

CHILDHOOD AND EXODUS OF MOSES.

Exodus 2:1-15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds. Acts 7:22.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fifth mo. 20.—Childhood, etc., of Moses. Ex. 2:1-15.
Third-day, Fifth mo. 21.—Moses in Midian. Ex. 2:16-25.

Seventh-day, Fifth mo. 25.—God overruling. Psa. 33:10-22.
First-day, Fifth mo. 26.—A happy childhood. II Tim. 3:10-17.

Time.—Moses was born probably during the reign of Ramses II, the "Pharaoh of the oppression," which was perhaps 1275-1208 B. C. Authorities differ, varying from 1598 to 1275 B. C., as the beginning of the reign. The date of the birth would be somewhere between 1571 and 1248.

Place.—Unknown, but near the capital city, which may have been Memphis, near modern Cairo, or Tanis (Zoan), in the Nile delta.

Contemporary events.—The Trojan war is supposed to have taken place about this time.

The lessons are now for some time taken up with the character and career of Moses, or with incidents in which he played an important part. Without question, he is one of the great characters of the Bible, and is depicted graphically and truthfully. His virtues are not unduly magnified, neither are his failings minimized. He and David are the great heroes of the Hebrew race, and, of the two, Moses has had the greater influence. As a leader, a law-giver, an organizer, as a nation-maker, he is unsurpassed. The actual details of his life which are given are comparatively few, for we know almost nothing of two-thirds of his life—his early life in Egypt and his sojourn in Midian.

1. "A man." Amram, whose wife was Jochabed (Ex. 6:18, 20), his father's sister. Such unions were allowed in those days.

2. "Hid him." On account of the decree of Pharaoh, commanding all Hebrew male infants to be destroyed (Ex. 1:16, 20). How he was concealed is not told. It must have been with great difficulty.

3. "Ark of bulrushes." Compare Is. 18:2. This "bulrush" was probably the papyrus, of which baskets and even boats (canoes) were made. "Slime," probably bitumen. "Flags." A kind of reed common in the Nile and its tributaries. These reeds would prevent the basket from being carried down the stream.

4. His sister (Miriam) Ex. 15:20, 21, etc. As there is no mention of any other sister, it is reasonable to believe that it was Miriam. She must have been between 12 and 15 years old. "To wit." To know. R. V. She was to be far enough to avoid suspicion, yet near enough to see what might occur.

5. "The daughter of Pharaoh." Her name is not given in the Bible. Josephus says it was Thermuthis. "Wash herself." Better "bathe" R. V. The waters of the Nile were considered very healthful. It seems highly likely that the mother of Moses purposely chose a place where the princess would be likely to come, hoping that the sight of the infant would arouse her pity. "Saw the ark." Her curiosity was aroused.

6. "And she opened it, and saw the child." R. V. "And, behold, the babe wept." Rather more literally, "And, lo, a weeping boy." "She had compassion on him." Her true woman's nature was stirred. "This is one of the Hebrew's children." Only such would be thus concealed; or the lighter complexion might have told her.

7. The beautiful simplicity of the narrative could not be improved.

8. It can hardly be doubted that the princess saw through the whole plot, but was more than willing to do her share. "Maid." Better, "maiden."

9. It must be understood that from this time the mother of Moses must have been recognized as the servant of the princess, otherwise the child would not have been safe.

10. "The child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter." His age is not given. It may have been two years or more. "Became her son." Whether this was a formal adoption in the modern sense cannot be known, but it would seem so. The Old Testament is silent as to the life of Moses while living as "the son of Pharaoh's daughter." It is from Stephen's speech (Acts 7:21, 22) that we are told that "Moses was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; and he was mighty in his words and works."

11. "When Moses was grown up." R. V. Again Acts supplements Exodus, for Stephen says, "When he was well-nigh forty years old." R. V. It must have been about this time that Moses made the great choice, referred to in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11:24-27). "His brethren." He remembered—perhaps had treasured his Hebrew descent. "Burdens." See Ex. 1:11.

12. His rage overcame him. "Hid him in the sand." This shows that it was on the borders of the desert. The action of Moses was clearly illegal. It was not his place to execute such summary vengeance.

13. "The second day." The day following. Moses was conscious of his mission, though he had not, apparently, learned how to carry it out. He not only wished to remove oppression from his people, but also to make them live justly with each other.

14. "Moses feared." He saw that his action of the day before was known to the Hebrew, and that he would not scruple to make it known. The punishment would be death.

15. "He sought to slay Moses." It is not said whether it was the Pharaoh in whose reign Moses was born. "Sought." The word rather implies that Pharaoh did not dare to seize Moses off hand. "Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh." It is not easy to harmonize this satisfactorily with the statement in Hebrews 11:27. "Land of Midian." The exact position of this territory has been the subject of much discussion. It is most often regarded as being in the southeastern part of the peninsula of Sinai in Arabia. Most of the Midianites lived east of Palestine. Gen. 25:1-4; Judg. 6:3; Numb. 22:4.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side."—Lowell.
2. Hebrews 11:24-26.

The thoroughly great men are those who have done everything thoroughly and who have never despised anything, however small, of God's making.—Ruskin.

One of the secrets of happiness is the using of little pleasures. So many wait for the larger blessings, and, because they seldom or never come, miss all the joy.—Selected.

HOME MISSIONS—THE PROGRESS OF THE SOUTHERN MOUNTAINEERS.

In the mountains of the southern Appalachian system live communities of the purest colonial descent, unchanged for their almost two centuries' sojourn in America by any admixture of foreign blood. Indeed, an immigrant would be an object of the greatest curiosity to them, and an inability to speak the English language would no doubt be generally explained, as in an instance that recently came to my knowledge, on the ground that the person so incapacitated was crazy. Injurious intermarried, and cut off from all external influences, their lives are narrow and barren, and their prejudices intense. Ignorance and poverty have operated to dwarf them in many ways, yet their quick response to physical and intellectual betterment is proof of the fundamental soundness of the stock in spite of the years of neglect.

The great demand for cotton-mill and other labor in the South has led to the exploitation of the cabin-dwellers of the foothills and the mountains as operatives; and while there is a great change from the freedom and salubrious air of the old home to the din and clatter of mill and factory, in instances not a few it is the beginning of a more hopeful life, especially for the women and children. They may and do work at spindle and loom, but they also learn new wants, new standards, new possibilities in life, and doubtless in most places, if not in all, they find better school and church privileges than they ever knew before.

But not all find benefit in such changes, nor is it possible or desirable that all should be taken from their quiet abodes. Much that is admirable has come from these homes. A sincere patriotism, even though we must regret the form of its expression, led many from them into the armies of the Nation in its various wars. Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Jackson were of that stock. Some of the brightest and most successful business men of the South are sons of these sequestered mountaineers, whose lives were as rude and destitute of outcome, to all outward seeming, as is the rocky soil from which they won a bare subsistence. But the call of school and church reached them, and it is difficult to believe the stories of sacrifice undergone by some to fit themselves for usefulness in the world. Indifference past overcoming seems to hold some fast, and most often, perhaps, the men of middle life and beyond. As for the women, it may be taken as significant that a minister who came to know them well said that if he should write a book about this mountain country he would entitle it "The Land of the Sad-Faced Women." But the same Light of the World that we know belongs to them, and where He has shone gloom and ignorance and despair and crime vanish, and we see proved anew those words of our Master, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself."

LABOR TROUBLES IN ALASKA.

DEAR FRIEND—We have thought for some time it would be well for us to write a few statements about the conditions here since the trouble at the Treadwell gold mines. It seems the newspapers have exaggerated the conditions here, making it appear that the trouble is much worse than it really is. A number have been reported killed in a riot which is not true. Seven hundred of the eight hundred men employed formed a labor union, made their demands upon the company and quit work. How long it will continue we do not know, neither are we able to tell just what effect it will have upon our work here, since the town of Douglas is supported entirely by the Treadwell mines, both natives and whites. The difference now between the company and workmen is, the company refuse to recognize the union, although they recognize the grievances.

We hope no serious trouble will come from conditions, although the Government has ordered a small detachment of soldiers here to preserve order and protect the interests of the company.

Our work is still quite hopeful. About two weeks ago an Esquimo boy came to our meeting, seemed very much interested, and was led to accept Jesus as his Saviour, although wholly ignorant of the story of Jesus, yet he listened attentively as the good news was told to him and realized he was a sinner, lost and without hope. To use his own words, he "was in trouble and didn't know where he was at" but, "was so glad he came here and had found some one to tell him the way." He seems quite earnest, and said in his testimony last night he "aimed to stay with Jesus."

Quite a number of Friends have written making inquiry about Dick Smith, our native evangelist. We can say for Dick, he remains ever true, and is a power for good among his own people. He is well known to most all the natives of southeast Alaska, and has the confidence of his people as a Christian man, and the Lord wonderfully blesses his labors. A little incident in Dick's experience will show something of his fidelity. Most of the native men were induced to join the union, but Dick was troubled about it and came to us for advice. Finally he said "I wrote my name in Heaven. I don't think Jesus wants me to write in in the union," and that seemed to settle it. We were anxious for him to do what he felt the Lord would have him do, and that was his conclusion.

We are all quite well and the Lord is blessing and upholding us by His Spirit. Pray for us at this time of need that we may walk carefully and humbly before the Lord.

Sincerely thy friend,
J. PERRY HADLEY.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

In an article in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, I notice a disparaging reference to the women's session of the recent Peace Congress. I should like to give another view.

As was noted in one of our daily papers, the women's session was almost the only one which was entirely peaceful. It seemed most fully to display and teach the doctrine of George Fox, that the way to obtain peace is to "live in the spirit in which there is no war."

In reviewing the addresses of the conference to find some data for a young student, who was required to give a five-minute talk before his class on the subject of "Universal Peace," I found that the only address practicable for him to use was that of Lucia Mead Ames. Unfortunately, I could not obtain a satisfactory report of this in the newspapers. In my search I was reminded of the remark of my companion as we left the hall, after the women's meeting, "I like to hear women speak. They are so practical."

The "strong, trained masculine intellect," alluded to by your correspondent, made numerous patronizing and somewhat disparaging allusions to the so-called "extremists," who, as some of us feel, have sowed the seed and tilled the soil, which has made possible the conventions, the applause, the banquets, and the prizes of to-day.

The women did not use so many "ifs" and "buts" as the men, but in all simplicity showed their faith in the possibility of universal peace, and their belief that it is founded on the principles which govern all just and pure living.

I must confess that the address of Jane Adams was disappointing to me, as well as to your correspondent. She struck me as attempting to speak from a masculine standpoint. I believe that each sex has its own message, from its own standpoint, and that each should be heard.

To woman, "the ideal is the real," and on those few occasions when she is able to make herself heard in the world's chorus, she should sound her own note. Only thus can the harmony be complete. As your correspondent suggests, it might be better not to have what are called "women's meetings," but it is a fact that, in the present state of society, if there were no "women's meetings," the voice of woman would be rarely heard in public. If they are to have opportunity to speak, there must at least be some suppression of the masculine tendency to monopolize pulpit and platform. Women are such good listeners that they seem well satisfied to take, as their share, a majority of the seats in the audience. In fact, were it not for their appreciation of "the trained masculine intellect," it would often re-echo amid empty benches. We women admire it ardently, but are occasionally anxious to say something ourselves, if only in the hope that things hidden from the wise and prudent may be revealed unto babes.

REBECCA N. TAYLOR.

New York, Fifth month, 5, 1907.

EDITOR, THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I wish, before the time for any of our annual gatherings, except Philadelphia's, which has already passed, to say to all to whom this may come, that there is an inwrought prayer in my heart for the American Yearly Meetings of 1907, that they may be seasons of unusual quickening, blessing and power; and I would that this might become the heart-cry of the Church.

Dr. Talmage has said that the mightiest thing that you can do for a man is to pray for him. Andrew Murray, in his book of priceless worth, "With Christ in the School of Prayer," says: "It is in intercession that the church is to find and wield its highest power. * * * I feel sure that so long as we look on prayer chiefly as the means of maintaining our own Christian life, we shall not know fully what it is meant to be. But when we learn to regard it as the highest part of the work entrusted to us, the root and strength of all other work, we shall see that there is nothing that we so need to study and practice as the art of praying aright. * * * * It is only when the Church gives herself up to this holy work of intercession that we can expect the power of Christ to manifest itself in her behalf."

He says, further: "In connection with this there is another truth that has come to me with wonderful clearness as I studied the teachings of Jesus on prayer. It is this: That the Father waits to hear every prayer of faith, to give us whatsoever we will, and whatsoever we ask in Jesus' name. We have become so accustomed to limit the wonderful love and large promises of our God that we cannot read the simplest and clearest statements of our Lord without the qualifying clauses by which we guard and expound them. If there is one thing I think the Church needs to learn, it is that God means prayer to have an answer, and that it hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive what God will do for His child who gives himself to believe that his prayer will be heard."

The promise of Jesus was and is, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in My name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son." John 13:14. "If ye abide * * * * ask whatsoever ye will and it shall be done unto you." John 15:7. "Ye did not choose Me, but I choose you, * * * * that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in My name, He may give it you." John 15:16.

These and other equally wonderful promises in the Word of God place the mighty powers of the ministry of intercession at our command, with the infinite resources of Heaven and the Throne itself back of it; and we are responsible for its use or for the neglect of it.

The author above quoted encourages us to take the promises simply and literally, as they stand. And the message that is in my heart at this time is, that we bring this marvelous power of prayer to bear upon the American yearly meetings of this year, and, indeed, the annual gatherings of Friends everywhere, remembering, also, the Five Years' Meeting.

It would seem that the rapidity with which the world, aye the Church itself, is moving on through tremendous issues and to eternal destinies at the coming of our Lord, should call us to our knees in deepest humility and put us on our faces before God, in prayer and faith that will not be denied, for His blessing upon us, that we might be a blessing in the vital, practical, real spirit of original Quakerism. To this end let us pray, and praying, believe.

I would have us note that one yearly meeting convenes this month, three in the Sixth month, one in the Seventh month, four in the Eighth month, two in the Ninth month, one in the Tenth month, and one in the Eleventh month, beginning with New York, and closing with Baltimore.

Any whose hearts God may touch for this special service of intercession, may make it known by correspondence, that we may be apprised that the condition is met upon which the promise "If two of you agree," Matthew 18:19, is based, and be able to appropriate said promise.

In His name,

ELLA C. COFFIN.

Acksa C. Kenyon, Baxter Springs, Kan., spent six weeks visiting the families of Haviland Quarterly Meeting, Kan. She was favored to visit 129 families and attend several meetings, and her services were very acceptable.

Allen C. Thomas, Haverford, Pa., addressed the Young People's Union, Baltimore, First day evening, Fourth month 28, on "Apostolical Ministry." He was also present and spoke at the regular meeting for worship in the morning.

Mary S. Knowles, who has been, for about three years, matron and resident minister at the Oakwood Seminary, Union Springs, N. Y., will close her work there Sixth month, 30th, as her strength is not equal to the work and responsibility.

Blue River Quarterly Meeting, Western Yearly Meeting, was held at Paoli, Ind., the 26th to 28th ult. Ralph S. Coppock and Gertrude Moon Reinier were present and were greatly blessed by the Lord in Gospel service. The attendance was large and the interest good throughout all the sessions.

G. N. and L. Ella Hartley were in attendance at Dover, Ind., Meeting, the 28th ult., and assisted in holding a Bible School Conference in the afternoon. An interesting company gathered for the morning service, and the theme presented was varied by references to scenes in the Holy Land.

Nine persons were received as members of Boston Monthly Meeting last meeting, and two the month before. The attendance at the meetings for worship, Bible-school, and Christian Endeavor have almost doubled in the last two years. More young people are interested in the meeting than ever before in its history. There is some talk of organizing a fellowship soon.

Oliver N. and Isabella Kenworthy, both ministers of the Gospel, have been engaged in pastoral work at Salem, Ore., the past year. The meeting has arranged with them to continue their work. The meeting has steadily grown in interest, and an increase of 31 members is reported. A series of 33 meetings were held in First month, in which the Church was greatly edified.

Vanwert Quarterly Meeting, held at Rockford, Ohio, the 3d to 5th ult., was favored with the presence of S. Adelbert Wood, Knightstown, Ind., Levi Cox, Winchester, Ind., William P. Angell, Muncie, Ind., George W. Bird, Praysville, Ind., and Isaiah Jay, Fairmount, Ind. Also a number of other ministers and workers were present. The attendance was larger than usual, and all rejoiced together.

A series of meetings, conducted by Eliza P. Gidley, were recently held at Friends' Academy, near Gate, Okla., resulting in definite blessing to over 40, and 28 accessions to the church. Under the management of Prof. Thomas J. Perry, the school year has been a successful one. The number of students is increasing as the strength and work of the school are made known. The enrollment this year averages about 20.

Friends' Missionary Advocate for Fifth month is a special Indian number. Several half-tone pictures of Indian groups, missionaries, mission houses, and school houses make the paper very attractive. The leading article is on "Friends' Missionary Work among the North American Indians, Past and Present;" then follow short sketches of the several mission stations. The whole is a valuable and interesting number.

Following the dedication of the new meeting house at South Wabash, Ind., George W. Willis conducted a revival for two weeks, closing the 5th inst. He was assisted in the effort by the pastor, Levi T. Pennington. The meetings were characterized throughout by a very sweet spirit, the church was built up and strengthened. Christians took steps into deeper things, and a number of souls, especially among the young, were brought into the kingdom.

The good people of Richmond, Ind., have been making a strenuous effort, during the past five months, to raise $100,000, to erect a Y. M. C. A. building. Several pledges were given on condition that the $100,000 mark be reached by Fifth month, 1st. The grand total of subscriptions was $94,167.01 on that date, and the Association decided to push the work without delay. The names of several prominent Friends appear in connection with the effort.

Our dear friends, Timothy B. and Anna M. Hussey, North Berwick, Maine, will reach the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage on the 27th inst. They have been fifty years full of happiness, and crowded with service to the world. Few persons known to us can with better right be felicitated and congratulated. Long may they live to shed their light abroad, and to receive the love of those who rise up to bless their memory!

Friends of Chehalem Center Meeting, Newberg Quarterly Meeting, Ore., dedicated their new meeting house, the 14th ult., free of debt. The house cost about $1,200, beside a large amount of volunteer work by the members and others in the vicinity. F. M. George, Yearly Meeting Evangelistic Superintendent, preached at the dedication. He was assisted by H. T. Cash. The meeting has, during all its existence of about fifteen years, met in a school-house. The new building is as good as any in the yearly meeting.

Wm. E. Cox, whose obituary appears this week, was the son of Joseph M. Cox and grandson of Joseph Cox, Wayne County, Ind., one of the first pioneer settlers, among Friends in that part of the country. Wm. E. Cox was a student of Earlham College, and a graduate of the law school at Ann Arbor, a life-long, active member of the Friends' church, and an earnest worker, especially in the temperance and educational interests of the church. He was a lawyer by profession, and will be much missed in the church and community.

John M. Watson has been visiting Friends in Tennessee during the past month, and expected to go from there to Piney Woods, N. C., last week. He sends us the following account of Friendsville Quarterly Meeting, held at Marysville, Tenn., the 27th and 28th ult. "It was a time of much blessing. Margaret Hackney, North Carolina, Anna M. Ray, New England, who is sojourning for a time in Tennessee, and John M. Watson, Wilmington Y. M., were in attendance, beside their home ministers, Lamar Townsend and Samuel L. Herworth.

Orange County, Indiana, is preparing for a home-coming of its former citizens, Eighth month, 22 to 24, 1907, at Paoli. One day, the 23d, is to be devoted to the reunion of the former students and patrons of what is known in that part of the country as the "Pinkham School," the years in which William P. Pinkham was in charge in the "Southern Indiana Normal," located at that place, and also had supervision of the public schools of the town. Among those interested are many Friends now located in other fields. William P. Pinkham is to be present and address the gathering on that day.

Josephine H. Wilson, secretary of the Evangelistic Committee of Western Yearly Meeting, sends us the following:

"The committee met at Indianapolis, Fourth month, 19, 1907. This was the first meeting of the committee since the death of our beloved friend and member, William L. Pyle. All felt a deep sense of the loss the committee has sustained, as he had served as treasurer for nearly thirty years. His books were gone over and found to be in most excellent condition; so that it will be easy for the new treasurer to take up the work where he left off.

"William N. Trueblood, Kokomo, Ind., was appointed to that position, and any unpaid pledges may be sent to him."

Adrian Quarterly Meeting, Mich., was held at Raisin Center the 4th to 6th inst. Lloyd East, Penn. Mich., was present all through and spoke Sixth day afternoon and evening. Edward Mott, Cleveland, Ohio, came later, and preached a powerful sermon on Seventh day. William P. Pinkham, also of Cleveland O., came in time to be present on First day. He preached in the morning and spoke for the Bible School Conference in the afternoon. The request from Ipsilanti for a new monthly meeting to be established at Burt, near Saginaw, was approved, and a committee appointed to attend the opening, Sixth month 13th. The funeral of Maria Gallaway, the eldest member of Raisin Meeting, was held Seventh morning, from her home, near the meeting house.

In the "Twenty-third Biennial Report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana" is an article on the "Early Services of the Quakers to Education in Eastern Indiana," by Benjamin S. Parks. Articles, in the same report, on early education by M. L. Bundy and former Attorney-General D. P. Baldwin, speak in high terms of the contributions of Friends to educational work in this State, and an article by W. A. Bell, for many years editor of the Indiana School Journal, on "The Growth of the High School," makes extensive reference to the system of academies controlled by Friends. W. A. Bell says, "The Friends, in proportion to their numbers, did more than any other denomination." There is also a brief biography of B. C. Hobbes, at one time State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

We publish this week an obituary of Uriah Spray, who is well known among Friends in Indiana and Kansas. He was a native of Ohio, but soon after his marriage with Mary Mills, in 1847, they migrated to Indiana, and resided near Indianapolis until 1871. In that year they were sent by Friends to work among the Kaw Indians, near Council Grove, Kansas. In 1872 he was named as one of a commission to select a new location for the Kaw Indians, and in 1873 they assisted in the removal of the Kaw Tribe to their present location, and established their Indian school. They left the school in 1894, and settled in Arkansas City, Kansas, where they resided until 1903; then they returned to the old field of their labors, now named Washungo, Oklahoma, where they resided until his death. He organized a Sabbath-school there and was its superintendent until within a short time of his death.

In reviewing Dr. Edward H. Magill's autobiography, "Sixty-five Years in the Life of a Teacher," Henry Stanley Newman says, in a recent number of The Friend (London): "But the great value of the book is found not simply in its advice to teachers. It is much more in its instructive narrative of the history of Swarthmore College, of which President Magill was for many years the ruling spirit. The college was opened in 1869, and being but 10 miles from Haverford, there has always been a strong bond of sympathetic interest between the two colleges. 'The two colleges continued to feel that it was their place to do what they could to heal the wounds caused by the division of the Society of Friends in 1827.' 'The same feeling continues to this day.' 'These two leading colleges of the two branches of our Society have done much toward the restoration of harmony, which was so sadly broken by the separation of 1827.'"

The following, from The Friend (Philadelphia), is of general interest:

"A funeral observance of the decease of our friend, Thomas Scattergood, who was buried in Naples, Italy, was held in Twelfth Street Meeting House, on the afternoon of the 6th inst., filling the floor of the house, although the day was stormy. It was a solemnized occasion, bearing much testimony to the love in which he was esteemed. His widow, Maria Chase Scattergood, arrived at her home on the 2d inst., to find also her aunt, Martha Oliver, deceased the day before, who had borne, up to the age of eighty years, a noble record as the stay and upholder of others, whether we regard her home in Lynn, Mass., or the home which she made an important feature of Cornell University for her brother, Prof. James Edward Oliver, a remarkable mathematician there for twenty years; of latter years she was the faithful companion of her sister, Elizabeth, in Philadelphia, who is the widow of Prof. Pliny Earle Chase."

It may interest the Friends of the work at Dobson, N. C., to learn that the workers are still engaged in the same kinds of service that they felt led to take up six years ago. During this time a building has been erected, which contains a room for the use of a Bible-school and religious meetings on the first floor and rooms for the workers, of whom there are usually four, on the second floor. The Bible-school is held at 10 o'clock on First day mornings, a meeting for worship at 11 o'clock, and another meeting in the evening. There is also a meeting on Fourth day evenings, and a Bible class for women, held at the different homes, on Fifth day afternoons, a Bible class for young people, in the sitting room of the worker's home, on Sixth day evenings, and a "children's hour" on Seventh day afternoons, at the same place. The workers are busy each forenoon with housekeeping duties, a Bible lesson, and attention to callers. During the afternoon they go out, two together, to call on families in the town and surrounding country, often walking two miles and making from one to six calls. As this is the county seat of Surrey County, they hold meetings during the court sessions and distribute reading matter to people on the streets who come from different parts of the country. The members of the meeting hold a business meeting once a month, which reports to White Plains Monthly Meeting, 8 miles away. Dobson has a fine situation, in sight of the Pilot and Blue Ridge mountains, and its elevation above sea-level is greater than that of Mt. Airy, 12 miles distant.

Several Friends in Germantown, Pa., are encouraging negro education in the South, as will appear from the following clipping from a local newspaper:

"A most interesting evening was spent at the home of Mrs. Eleanor T. Evans, on Church Lane, on Tuesday last, when a large number of guests listened to J. H. Torbert, vice-president of Fort Valley Industrial School, of Georgia.

Principal Torbert is striving to elevate his people, like Booker T. Washington, by teaching the men all kinds of trades and the girls household economy in all of its departments, including laundering, cooking, sewing, dress-making, etc.

Torbert's address was relieved from time to time by the quartette, which sang with touching sweetness and pathos many of the plantation songs and hymns which are so familiar to us all. After the exercises were concluded, resolutions were adopted looking towards raising a sum annually to support two or three scholarships at Fort Valley, and Thomas Evans was appointed treasurer to receive any contributions that those who are interested in the effort to elevate the colored race may feel disposed to make. A yearly scholarship costs only $50. There are at the present time about 500 pupils at the school.

Some of those present at the gathering on Tuesday were Dr. Edward G. Rhoads, Elliston P. Morris and Miss Morris, Mrs. Benjamin H. Shoemaker, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Penn Shipley, Mr. and Mrs. Theophilus B. Stork, Herbert Welsh, Francis Stokes, Mr. and Mrs. John M. Whitall, Stanley R. Yarnall, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Potts, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Mason, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Goodhue, Mr. and Mrs. Elwood Reeves.

At the late semi-annual meeting of the board of directors of Friends' University, Wichita, Kan., very encouraging reports were presented from the various departments, showing an encouraging increase in attendance in the college, as well as in the preparatory school.

One of the important movements inaugurated was the step taken for the enlargement of the Biblical School. The plan is to provide for a comprehensive work in this line, that will meet the desires of the student in preparation for Christian work in church and mission. As head of this department for eight years, it has been the purpose of Prof. J. Edwin Jay to make it a prominent factor in the University. Of late, the duties devolving upon Professor Jay as vice-president have greatly increased his labor; also, the Biblical department has already increased in numbers and requirements beyond the extent of one man's ability to care for in all the needed lines of teaching, so that the board decided to add another member to the faculty, who could give his time to the Biblical department. This will relieve Prof. Jay for more work in the vice-presidency, but enable him also to continue a regular department of teaching in the Biblical School. William L. Pearson, Ph.D., formerly of Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, has been chosen as Professor of Biblical Literature and Exegesis.

The board feels very glad that by their increasing ability they are able to add so able an educator as Dr. Pearson to the faculty, and also to materially increase the compensation of the faithful members with us in the past.

A memorial library has been lately founded in memory of Laura E. Kirby, Friends' University's dearly beloved teacher, who died last Tenth month, after seven years faithful work as librarian and Professor of English Language and Literature in the University. The idea came to her father as a cheering thought from his desolate heart, to promote the hope and stimulate the spirit of the youth she so sincerely loved, that her memory might be enriched as the light of her love to them reached out in life's joys, successes or labor of cheer or toil.

It is desired that Friends everywhere may contribute liberally to this memorial library, not only in memory of a noble young life well and faithfully lived, but for the promotion of the learning of the youthful followers of better things on the pathway of life.

A small group of Philadelphia Friends especially interested in visiting meetings has called Friends with a like concern to meet and confer together on several occasions during the past three years. These gatherings have been helpful, and the efforts growing out of them were much commended in our late yearly meeting, and encouragement given to continued faithfulness in this line.

Friends therefore who feel a responsibility for some effort of this kind are invited to come together, that we may prayerfully confer regarding our duty and exchange practical suggestions.

The time appointed is Seventh day, Fifth month, 18th, 2.30 to 4.30 P. M., in the Committee Room of Twelfth Street Meeting House.

Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Christian Endeavor Union Convention will be held at the new Friends' meeting-house, South Wabash, Ind., Fifth month, 24, 25, 26, 1907.

The program of the convention is designed to meet the need of your society. All through the winter the Executive Committee has attempted to unite our C. E. forces along lines of Christian work. The theme has been, "The Enlargement of Our Borders." For the working out of this idea, in the convention, we have secured some of the best talent the church affords to inspire us to attain to higher heights in Christian activity than ever before.

We are glad to present to you a partial list of speakers at this time:

CHANGE IN FOOD

WORKS WONDERS IN HEALTH.

It is worth knowing that a change in food can cure dyspepsia. "I deem it my duty to let you know how Grape-Nuts food has cured me of indigestion.

"I had been troubled with it for years, until last year my doctor recommended Grape-Nuts food to be used every morning. I followed instructions and now I am entirely well.

"The whole family like Grape-Nuts, we use four packages a week. You are welcome to use this testimonial as you see fit."

The reason this lady was helped by the use of Grape-Nuts food, is that is predigested by natural processes, and therefore does not tax the stomach as the food she had been using; it also contains the elements required for building up the nervous system. If that part of the human body is in perfect working order, there can be no dyspepsia, for nervous energy represents the steam that drives the engine.

When the nervous system is run down, the machinery of the body works badly. Grape-Nuts food can be used by small children as well as adults. It is perfectly cooked and ready for instant use.

Read, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

Charles E. Hiatt, Muncie, pastor of Muncie Friends Church, will open the convention with, "The Enlargement of Our Borders—Why?"

Clarence M. Case, Richmond, pastor of the South Eighth Street Church and president of Indiana C. E. Union, will have "Implements and How to Use Them" for his theme.

Ida Parker, Earlham College, will use the convention theme in relation to Bible study, and Alice E. Winder, Richmond, will tell about adult schools in England, as she has seen them.

Homer J. Coppock, Greenfield, pastor of Greenfield Friends' Church, will conduct "An Hour with Bibles and Note-books." Bring Bibles and note-books to this session.

Anna McBane, Thorntown, a general secretary of the W. F. M. Union, will conduct a missionary study class at the missionary session.

Alfred T. Ware, Richmond, pastor of East Main Street Friends' Church and president of Friends' International C. E. Union, will speak on "After the Ingathering—What?"

Thomas E. Williams, Portland, pastor of Portland Friends' Church, will preach the convention sermon.

Lillian E. Hayes, Dunreith, State superintendent of Junior work, will speak at the Junior session, and the Juniors of Wabash and elsewhere will have interesting exercises.

John Kittrell, Farmland, pastor of Farmland Friends' Church, will give the closing address, subject, "The Silent Hunt."

Question Box by Levi T. Pennington, South Wabash.

All subjects open for discussion.

Several readings, solos and quartettes have been arranged for.

Leora Bogue, Fairmount, will have charge of the music, and she needs no recommendation.

We want you to come and see Wabash, and enjoy the convention. Begin now to make arrangements. Let your society send delegates. Come in a body, and we feel sure you will be well paid.

The Call of the Christian.

Not always as the whirlwind's rush
On Horeb's mount of fear,
Not always as the burning bush
To Midian's shepherd seer,
Nor as the awful voice which came
To Israel's prophet bards,
Nor as the tongues of cloven flame,
Nor gift of fearful words,—

Not always thus, with outward sign
Of fire or voice from Heaven,
The message of a truth divine,
The call of God is given!
Awaking in the human heart
Love for the true and right,—
Zeal for the Christian's better part,
Strength for the Christian's fight.

Though heralded with naught of fear,
Of outward sign or show;
Though only to the inward ear
It whispers soft and low!
Though dropping, as the manna fell,
Unseen, yet from above,
Noiseless as dewfall, heed it well,—
Thy Father's call of love!

At the commencement exercises at Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., last week, President Hall announced that an unnamed donor had made a gift of $200,000 to the institution. The money will be used to erect the chapel of the new seminary.

Slower schedules are to be adopted by the leading railroads west of Chicago for their through expresses—the minimum time of trains from Chicago to Missouri River points being advanced from sixteen and one-half to twenty hours, and Denver trains from twenty-seven and one-half to thirty-two hours.

The extreme cold weather which has prevailed throughout large sections of the country, is delaying spring crops to such an extent that they are likely to be quite short. This situation is causing much disturbance in the markets, particularly evidenced last week by the phenomenal rise in wheat. The tendency at present is for much higher prices in all farm products for the coming year.

Yearly Meeting of Friends for New England will be held at Portland, Maine, commencing Fifth-day, Sixth month, 20, 1907, at 9 A. M., with meeting on Ministry and Oversight. Sixth-day, at 9 o'clock A. M., meeting for Discipline. Friends expecting to attend, and wishing board or rooms or other information, should address L. M. Douglas, 104 Exchange Street, or Mrs. Viola K. Rollins, 150 Free Street, Portland, Me.

A recent issue of The Churchman stated that there were fewer children in the Sunday-schools of the Episcopal church on Manhattan Island than there were ten years ago. This statement provoked discussion, and an investigation

FIT THE GROCER.

WIFE MADE THE SUGGESTION.

A grocer has excellent opportunity to know the effects of special foods on his customers. A Cleveland grocer has a long list of customers that have been helped in health by leaving off coffee and using Potum Food Coffee.

He says, regarding his own experience: "Two years ago I had been drinking coffee and must say that I was almost wrecked in my nerves.

"Particularly in the morning I was so irritable and upset that I could hardly wait until the coffee was served, and then I had no appetite for breakfast and did not feel like attending to my store duties.

"One day my wife suggested that inasmuch as I was selling so much Postum there must be some merit in it, and suggested that we try it. I took home a package and she prepared it according to directions. The result was a very happy one. My nervousness gradually disappeared, and to-day I am all right. I would advise everyone affected in any way with nervousness or stomach troubles, to leave off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

has been made which shows a heavy loss in the Sunday-schools of the Episcopal congregations within the Diocese of New York. Laymen of the church are holding a council this month to find out how conditions may be improved.

Charles A. Briggs, whose "higher criticism" of the Bible several years ago led to his trial for heresy and separation from the Episcopal Church, was the principal speaker at a meeting of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association one day last week. His paper was entitled, "The Virgin Birth," treating the subject in such an orthodox manner as to receive the commendation of his audience, and it was said that the meeting had unanimously expressed a wish that the paper might be published in full.

General Baron Kuroki has been sent to the United States to promote peace and good-will between the Japanese nation and our people. Admiral Dewey heads the list of Americans who have been named by the Japanese Society of New York to receive the General and his Company. It is gratifying to know that circumstances are such that two of the greatest war heroes of modern times are engaged in promoting peace between the two most aggressive powers struggling for supremacy of trade in the Pacific Ocean.

The Pennsylvania Society, of New York, has been endeavoring to secure a place in Westminster Abbey for a memorial of William Penn. They are in a fair way to succeed. In speaking of the matter, Dr. Robinson, dean of the Abbey, recently said: "If we fail to get permission to put a tablet either in the Abbey proper or the cloisters, we shall fall back on the proposition of a memorial window. I find, upon investigation, that there are several windows available for memorials. Of course, a window would be much more expensive than a tablet, but the society would not hesitate in the matter of expenses."

One year after the fire which destroyed San Francisco, the insurance underwriters have calculated the total loss at $350,000,000 in round numbers. Three thousand acres of densely-built territory were burned over. Yet, in consequence of the fire, only 20 companies suspended, some of which have resumed, while after the Chicago fire 50 companies went out of business, and many more after the Boston fire, the year following. The balance sheets of the insurance companies of the United States show a net loss of $114,000,000 in 1906, the most disastrous year in their history. By the insurance paid and by the courage and energy of its own citizens, San Francisco is fast rising from the ashes. The work of clearing away the ruins was an immense task. But to-day nearly all the burned business area and a great part of the residence districts have been cleared. All the streets are cleared and open for traffic.

The Y. M. C. A. are to have a new building and a new lease of life in Richmond, Ind. A clipping from the Item states:

"With all due acknowledgment to every contributor to the Y. M. C. A. fund, the lion's share of the credit for the success of the movement must be placed to the members of the Executive Committee. These twelve men gave unsparingly of their time and money. Their efforts have been taken from their business affairs and placed in other more generous pursuits. Their liberality has been remarkable. After all had made personal pledges, and it was made known that one pledge of $2,500 was lacking to obtain Mr. Henley's pledge, the committee agreed to raise this sum by increasing their personal contributions.

"The members of the committee are: "Sharon E. Jones, president; Timothy Nicholson, vice-president; Arthur L. Smith, secretary; Richard Sedgwick, treasurer; A. H. Bartel, E. G. McMahon, E. G. Hill, John H. Johnson, George H. Knollenberg, J. S. Harris, E. K. Shera, Jesse S. Reeves.

VANQUISHED, BUT NOT SUBDUED.

'Tis sad indeed, yet I must needs confess it,
Because my soul is weary, weary with the strife:
I'm vanquished! Yes! Yet I it is who tells it,
I who fought so valiantly thro' all the past.

One day, a boy still, sobs my heart-strings rending,
Sad, yet still confident, I raised my eyes,
And, toward a holy love my gaze directing,
The Loves' adverse fate I openly defied.

My very life I risked in many strivings;
Upon the threshold of the tomb my steps were staid;
And to the tho't that's free, creative and compelling, Myself—'twas all I had—I freely gave.

Ambition, peace, a future well assured,
Kindred and fatherland I left behind
For this. And now?

—Now all around is darkness!
I'm vanquished, yes, and weary.
The pity, oh, the pity of it all.

But not subdued! No, never! since I feel it,
The faith of brighter years still in my heart;
And tho' my soul be weary, bow, it will not,
To a master so inglorious and dark!

He all my heart's desires has carried captive.
Myself, till vanquished, he hath sore pursued,
Until life's disillusion, high up heaping
Have snapped the soul's most precious bonds of hope.

But faith remains! In heart and soul I feel it;
'Tis faith that calls me back to life again;
And if to hope I know not!
Faith sits enthroned!
And where Faith reigneth courage cannot fail!

OTHERISM.

This word, "otherism," is not as well known as it ought to be. Even those who bear the name of "Friends" may possibly need to be introduced to it. It is a word which expresses the trait of getting the other person's point of view; the habit of putting ourselves in the place of the person on whom we are tempted to pass judgment. Nobody sees life correctly so long as he is rooted and grounded in selfism. Such a man's observations upon other mortals are of no more value than were the views of the famous seven blind men who went to see an elephant. Before we can "judge" any person we must do more than view him from the outside. We must make a serious attempt to get his inner point of view. This attempt to get the inner point of view, before passing judgment, is what we mean by "otherism."

Nobody nowadays pretends to write the life of an historical character until he has made himself thoroughly familiar with the period in which the character lived. He studies the prevailing ideas of the time in which his man lived, he finds out what forces and conditions shaped and developed him. He endeavors to catch the mental and spiritual atmosphere which he breathed. He reconstructs the surroundings, and he tries as best he can to put himself, by imagination, in the place of the man whose character he is estimating.

But is this method any less important when we are trying to estimate the man next door to us, or our Christian brother in another State, than it is for the historian? Shall we condemn the lazy historian who takes no pains to know the conditions, outer and inner, of the character whom he is sketching, and shall we ourselves, at the same time, pass our sweeping judgments against our neighbors, though we have not the slightest knowledge of their inward struggles, or their outward burdens and problems?

We need to note the spirit of otherism in Christ's mountain sermon and correct our practice by it. This is the real remedy for the "judging" spirit. The moment we put ourselves in the place of others and decline to judge them until we have weighed all the circumstances of their lives, and are sure we understand them, that moment we introduce, in our little corner of the world, a sweeping reform! In fact, if we all did this, we should be quite on our way to a new kind of world.

The trouble is, we too often gaze out on the defects in others without taking any pains to correct our own vision. We run about commenting on the mote in a neighbor's eye, while everybody except ourselves knows that there is a "sliver" in our own eye. He is certainly a wise person who can constantly correct himself by seeing his own faults revealed in others; whose first thought, when he sees a disagreeable trait in another, is: "Ah, I am afraid that is an exhibition of something I am unconsciously doing. I will henceforth watch myself on that tack and get that 'sliver' out of my eye!"

This spirit of otherism is also well illustrated in the proverb, "Cast not pearls before swine." Pearls have no fattening quality; they are entirely wasted on pigs. The person who gets the pigs' point of view will not try to feed them on pearls. The application is easy. Before undertaking to help others, the first need is to understand what will help them. The spirit of helpfulness alone is not enough. We must get the point of view of those we wish to assist and make our contribution fit the case in hand. Much advice is wasted, because it is not needed. Much of our charity is likewise a misfit, and some of our preaching misses the mark because we preach, hit or miss, without knowing what the persons before us need. The sermon may be a pearl, but was it just the occasion for a pearl? Let us all practice otherism.

R. M. J.

JOSEPH.

The hero of the closing chapters of Genesis has lived again with those who are following the International Lessons. Like the young Galilean, Nathanael, we behold in him "an Israelite, indeed, in whom is no guile." Judged by the moral standards of his time, and we can almost say by the moral standards of all time, his record is spotless. It is in striking contrast with that of many Old Testament heroes. Moses displays his weakness more than once, David is notorious for his sinning and repenting, even Elijah languishes, and Jeremiah curses the day he was born. Nothing of this kind for Joseph—he meets the onslaughts of passion without wavering, slavery and imprisonment to him are God's stepping-stones to large service, the jealousy and fear of his brethren are met with love and forgiveness; in the midst of success he is humble; all this and more without a moment's wavering or a single instance of weakness. How did it come, and what does it mean?

There are some who shake their heads and tell us the narrative is not true to ancient standards. The ideals are too lofty. The story must have found its present form at a later time when the shortcomings of the real Joseph had faded from memory and his virtues were refined by the teachings of the prophets. Then again there are those who are sure the account is incomplete because "the heart of man is desperately wicked," and "there is none righteous, no, not one." They would have us believe that those who seem to be moral have a skeleton in the closet, and are worse than sinners because they add to their secret fault, deception. There may be much truth in these explanations, but the danger lies in their being half truths.

We love to read the story of Joseph as it is written, and think of him as an exception. Taken with the many heroes in Hebrew history, the whole is a truer picture of society, as we know it, than it would be without a Joseph, and others like him, of which we have a number. The idea that every life has a period of moral breakdown is not true. We are willing to grant the rule, but there are exceptions, and more exceptions possibly than we are wont to believe. We may be prone to wander in forbidden paths, and we may be weak at times, but there are many who can truly say that the general tenor of their life sets toward righteousness. This does not mean that there are some who do not need a Saviour. Paul declared he lived before God in all good conscience, and that God separated and called him from his mother's womb, yet none found a Saviour more precious than he. It is often the soul that is weary with long years of moral heroism which yearns most to rest upon the bosom of infinite love and feel the response of a heart-beat from One who was tempted and sinned not. No one can survey his life in the light of Christ without a sense of humiliation and regret, for the actual falls far short of the ideal. He may have been zealous for a cause that made him persecute the best the world has known, "O, chief of sinners that I am," and yet there may be no moral breakdown. Often the best people feel the keenest remorse.

It would not be so serious if poor Joseph were the only one who suffered from this idea of a necessary moral breakdown. It is working havoc at the present time in at least two very pronounced ways. On the one hand it encourages the thing it declares to exist by teaching the young it is practically necessary; by weakening their wills through telling them it is universal, therefore fashionable; and by bringing to bear upon them the force of suggestion. On the other hand, it drives many from churches because it paints the world blacker than it is, and many a soul, morally upright, yet hungry for the "bread of life," leaves the Christian fold because the Saviour we talk about seems only for vagabonds and thieves.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Pastor Koenig, who visited the United States in company with Charles Wagner two years ago, writes very interestingly from his home, in France. He is a deep student of religious life, not only in his own country, but also in other countries, and his comment on Quakerism deserves more than passing notice:

"I am making this very interesting experiment of applying Quakerism as I understand it, to renew the old Protestant soil here. The success has been immediate. My congregation is still interested, and I know that the spirit of Quakerism, which is, in my opinion, the true Christian spirit, has shown once again that it was a power when it was not sectarian. I understand that at the origin, Quakerism did not appear as being a church against churches. Quakerism was a power, a dynamis, as says St. Paul. If the churches had only understood that they were revived and renewed by this principle! But they did not wish to receive the Light. They fought against it; and the Quakers were obliged by circumstances to become a sect. Yet they are not a sect. I have confirmed this by my own experience—that we cannot accept all the truth which was given to George Fox and William Penn, and even in circles which seem to have no sympathy and no knowledge of historical Quakerism, without discovering that Quakerism can be a power."

"As the shoemaker hangs out a wooden shoe to show to the world that he makes shoes; as the watchmaker puts up a model watch to show that he makes watches, so in the midst of the White Mountains Almighty God has hung out a human face in stone to show that in New England He makes men." So spoke a provincial orator in one of the New England towns. Whatever one thinks of his oratory, the fact remains true that men are made in New England! and one of the places where they are made is Oak Grove Seminary. That institution has been no less successful in producing some very fine specimens of womanhood, also. It now needs $10,000 to carry out the plans of its committee for a career of enlarged usefulness. One Friend has promised $3,000 of the required amount. This announcement is made in the hope that some who read it may feel moved to volunteer a subscription, and that others may be getting into hair-trigger condition to respond when they are asked.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

ON THE YANGTSE RIVER.

BY ROBERT L. SIMKIN.

On Second month 6th, we left Ichang for Chungking, our party being made up as follows: On Capt. Li's houseboat were the Wigham family and Miss Warner, on Capt. Chung's (pronounced Jun) four-room houseboat were Mr. Toyne and Miss Stout, both of other missions, and Mrs. Simkin and myself. Accompanying these boats is a smaller cargo boat, on which Mr. Toyne sleeps, though he eats with us and spends the days on our boat. Our boat is 80 feet long and 11 feet wide at the widest point. The first 31 feet has no covering during the day and is occupied by the boat's crew of eight or nine men. At night a light framework is put up and covered with matting, under which the crew and about 27 trackers sleep, packed together on the deck like sardines in a box. The cooking for the trackers is done by a small coal stove in a hole at this end of the boat. Next, under a permanent roof, come four rooms in which the passengers live; next behind this is the kitchen for the passengers, in which the steersman also stands, while at the extreme stern over the rudder is a tiny room, in which the captain, his wife, his mother, and his little boy all sleep. Underneath the floors there is a great deal of room for freight.

When rowing, the boatmen and trackers have a peculiar sing-song, which one never hears anywhere else. Imagine a dozen men or more singing just outside the cabin door, and you will see that we did not have quiet during much of our trip. However, they do not row any more than they can help. While rowing they look up anxiously at the sail and whistle again and again for the wind to come and help them. We had a tremendous sail, braced with bamboo stays and so heavy that it was stiff work for four men to raise it. At the least indication of a favoring wind up would go this sail, the men giving us another little song at each lunge on the ropes. Much depends upon the wind, especially in the gorges, where the current would prove too strong for the oars alone, and where the banks are so steep that the trackers could not gain a foothold. Fortunately, we had splendid breezes when most needed, and so we passed in a few hours stretches which would have required days had the wind been contrary. Whenever we had a good breeze we easily kept ahead of Li's boat, as our sail was larger.

Unless the wind is very strong, the trackers are out on shore helping on our progress and often furnishing the only motive power. The ropes which are used are woven from eight to ten heavy strips of split bamboo, and are well adapted for the purpose, as they do not become heavy when wet. Drag them through the water and then through sand until they are grimy, and another bath makes them as good as new. One end is fastened to a timber near the foot of the mast, while at the other end the trackers attach their hempen cords, each of which is provided with a loop of soft cloth, which goes over one shoulder. Usually the trackers rush along pell mell, clambering over rocks and up cliffs high above the water, but if the current is very strong they settle into their harness and pull almost on their hands and knees, hardly gaining an inch. The big cargo boats have 30 or 40 trackers, and all boats must employ much additional help at the worst rapids. As the men walk they frequently swing their arms in concert, emitting at each step an explosive "Tsig, Tsig, Tsig."

The tracker boss, or "futow," is a most interesting personage. Armed with a section of stiff bamboo rope, he runs back and forth along the line, scolding (which means swearing) most awfully at the men and whacking them over the backs to get them to go faster. He ties himself (and particularly his face) into double knots in his excitement, and his throat is hoarse from his continual shouting. From his actions, one would think that he was half killing the men, but it is noticeable that his awful stroke loses its force about a foot before it reaches the man, and the rope descends harmlessly upon the thickly-wadded coat. If a tracker has stripped to the waist, as he often does, the "futow" purposely misses his bare back and brings the rope down "whack!" upon the sand. The trackers work very hard. From dawn until dark they must pull hard over sharp rocks and through heavy, loose sand, where it would be difficult to make headway even without a load. Two or three times a day they stop for about fifteen minutes to gulp their rice, and then on they go. After their meal at night they spread their padded beds on the bare floor and sleep soundly until dawn, when it is the same round of hard work. For the entire trip, about a month's hard work, all they receive is their food and about an American dollar. (This has much greater purchasing power, however.) They have no Sundays and no holidays, except the New Year and such other times as they are unemployed. On our boats we did not travel Sunday, so they had a chance to wash their clothes and rest, a privilege which they enjoyed greatly. Small lads are frequently employed, but they are plucky, and want to do as much as the men.

The night before the start we went aboard at night-fall and as Mr. Toyne had not yet come to translate for us, we had to make the cook understand by signs what we wanted for supper. In the midst of our directions one of the crew hung an immense brass gong upon the tiller and pounded it with a mallet until we had to put our fingers in our ears. He then placed himself before a small idol, which is above the door of the captain's room, spread a piece of paper on the floor, and bowed his forehead to it several times.

At the beginning of a trip a rooster is also sacrificed to the god of the river. On our boat this took place a day or two before we started, so we saw only the blood and feathers on the bow; on Li's boat, the ceremony took place on the afternoon of the first day, just as we entered the Ichang Gorge. We were startled by hearing crackers on the other boat, and, looking out, we saw that "cash paper" was being lighted and thrown on the water to "buy the right of way." The sacrificer, with bared head, bled the rooster from the mouth, and then, standing erect, he held the fowl at arm's length, allowing the blood to run down upon the bow of the boat. In order that the river god might not overlook the sacrifice, he plucked a handful of feathers from the neck, wet them in the blood, and smeared them on the bow, where some of them remained to the end of the trip. Then holding the fowl in both hands, he bowed himself three times, and so completed the ceremony. I believe the rooster was afterward eaten. On a number of occasions firecrackers were lighted and burning cash paper was strewn on the water just as we came opposite some temple on the hills or image cut in the rocks at the side of the river. This was accompanied sometimes by the bowing of the forehead to the deck, or by firing a small cannon.

The first day we made about 30 li (one li equals about one-third of a mile), mooring that night in the Ichang Gorge, where is stationed a customs inspector, who paid us a short call. One may get some idea of the tremendous traffic on the Upper Yangtse by this official's record of 48 junks having passed up the river that day, 1,300 the previous month. At 10 o'clock the following morning we stopped at a little village on the bank and laid in a good supply of bamboo rope. In the afternoon we had our first taste of rapids, the Tung Lin Tan, around which we walked.

Friday morning all was excitement, as we were nearing the Chin Tan, at this season of the year one of the worst on the river. We placed all our dishes and breakables on the floor, put out our charcoal fire, and, carrying a suit-case with a few valuables, climbed out on shore just below the lower rapid. This lower rapid was quickly passed, and, after getting out of its power, the boatmen cast off the towing line and passed on up the middle of the river under full sail, taking advantage of a powerful backwash, which carried the boat almost to the rapid itself. Then watching their time, they shot across the strong down current, rowing with all their might, and just succeeded in gaining the place at the head of a long line of cargo boats, which were waiting their turn to go up. It was a splendid bit of good management, for which we could not but admire the skill of our boatmen. Our cargo boat tried the same tactics, but was carried down past six or eight before she could get out of the current. A second time she tried, crossing back over the current and then sailing up in the backwash as before, only to fail again, for, although she caught the second boat in the line and struggled hard to hold fast to it, the current was too strong and she was swept downward. The third time she was successful and shot ahead of our boat, thus going up the rapid ahead of us.

From the foremost place in the line it was easy to work the boats up to a tiny cove or shelter, where each boat put out three strong lines, passing them up over the rocks to heavy stone posts, around which the ropes were wound, every inch being made secure as fast as the trackers had gained it. Beside these three ropes, two heavy lines were fastened from the boat to great rocks on shore to prevent the boat's swinging out too far into the current. When all was ready the three lines of trackers bent to their task, the boat pushed out into the stream, and the battle with the rapid was on in earnest. Inch by inch the boat crept forward, the foam dashing angrily from her bow. In the very midst of the rapid three cannon were fired from the boat at the rushing waters. Ten minutes of suspense passed, after which the boat began to respond more quickly to the combined pull of over 100 men, and we knew that the battle with this rapid was won. No words can picture the wild beauty of the scene which forms the setting of this rapid. On both sides rise abruptly great walls of rock of such tremendous height as to dwarf into insignificance the few miserable huts perched upon their sides. The majesty of the hills, the rush and roar of the water, the shouting of the men, and the frantic gestures of the old pilot at the bow form a picture long to be remembered.

THE INTERPRETATION AND USE OF THE BIBLE.

BY ELBERT RUSSELL.

XV. THE HISTORICAL BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

(Concluded.)

These books are usually called "historical books," and we have seen that, in general, their narratives are historically true. Yet there are certain characteristics of them that raise the question as to whether their purpose is historical; i. e., whether they were written primarily to give information about events of history. We note in the first place, that the authors have not been at great pains to verify their sources; they have taken and used what they found. In details the different books not only have different representations of the same event, but the same writer often leaves discrepancies and apparent contradictions in his own work. Examples will make this clear. The book of Chronicles usually gives a greater idea of the size and importance of Judah than does Kings. In I Kings 12:21, the total available forces of the kingdom of Judah are 180,000. In II Chronicles, a very few years later, the successor of Rehoboam is represented as raising an army of 400,000, while Jeroboam met him with 800,000 men. This would make the total military strength of these two petty kingdoms almost equal the largest army that the Persian Empire could furnish under Xerxes centuries later. A comparison of the account of the coronation of Solomon in I Kings 1 with that in I Chronicles 28 shows striking differences of representation. In I Kings 3:4 Solomon is said to have sacrificed at Gibeon because it was a great "high place," and 3:2 explains that such high-place worship was of the kind that is later condemned in the book but was excusable in Solomon's day because the temple was not yet built. In II Chronicles 1:3-5 it is explained that Solomon went to Gibeon because it was the one legitimate place of sacrifice, the tabernacle and brazen altar of Moses being there. In II Kings 24:4 Manasseh's sin is said to have been so heinous that even the good reformation of king Josiah could not cause God to forgive the nation for participating in it. In II Chronicles 33:13 we are told that Manasseh, carried captive to Babylon for his sins, repented and in answer to his prayer he was restored by God to his throne and for the rest of his reign was a zealous reformer and worshipper of Jehovah (33:15, 16). Between the Gospels similar differences of representation are found. Matthew says there were two Gaderene demoniacs; Mark mentions one only (Matthew 8:28; Mark 5:2). Matthew (8:5) says that the centurion came to Jesus; Luke (7:3,6) says that he sent to Jesus not feeling worthy to meet Jesus himself. Matthew says Jesus healed two blind beggars at Jericho (20:30) as He was entering the city; Luke (18:35) say He healed one as He was leaving the city. Such discrepancies are not confined to cases in different books. Sometimes the same thing is given differently in the same book. In II Kings (8:25) Ahaziah is said to have become king in the twelfth year of Joram, king of Israel. In 9:29 he is said to have begun to reign in the eleventh year of Joram. In II Kings 18:1 Hezekiah's first year is given as the third of Hoshea. In the ninth verse of the same chapter Hezekiah's fourth year is given as Hoshea's seventh. It is certainly probable that the writer of the book had data that made all these seemingly contradictory statements in some sense correct; but the important point is that he did not take pains to remove the flat contradictions; for the purpose for which he wrote the exact dates were unimportant. This shows that he was not writing as a historian. We must seek his purpose in some other way.

That the primary purpose of the writers of these books was not to give historical information is seen also in the way they have selected their material. It is shown in their omissions quite as much as in what they give. One who reads these books with the historical and biographical interests uppermost will be continually baffled. One gets interested in the personality of Elijah and wishes to know something of his early life and training; but he springs into the narrative full-grown. Nothing is told of him until a religious crisis in Israel makes him of importance to the progress of the true religion. Jeroboam II was the greatest conqueror among the Hebrews after David; the most splendid ruler after Solomon. Yet the writer of the book of Kings is so little interested in history, as history, that he dismisses this reign with a brief statement of its religious significance and only incidentally do we learn of the history the writer did not care to copy from the royal chronicles (II Kings, 14:23-19). None of our Gospels give us a biography of Jesus. Outside of a few incidents in the first two years and in the twelfth year of His life we know nothing of the first thirty years. Even during his brief public ministry there are periods of months of which we have no record. The book of Acts is silent as to the labors of most of the twelve, and really gives us little of the life of Paul as a whole.

When we come to examine the matter that is narrated, and especially the way in which it is treated, we discover that the purpose of the so-called historical book is not primarily to record facts for history's sake, but rather to record those matters that teach or illustrate religious truth. The book of Judges is really a sermon. Its text runs: "And the children of Israel did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah, and went and served the Baalim and Ash-taroht. And the anger of Jehovah was kindled against them and He sold them into the land of . . . and He mightily oppressed them . . . years. Then the children of Israel cried unto Jehovah and He heard them and gave them a deliverer, even . . ." This theme of sin and punishment, repentance and salvation is illustrated by stories of the times of the judges. The book of Kings with its story of the rise and fall of kings and people, with its verdict on the religious character of each reign, is intended to preach the truth that "righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to any people." In the New Testament we find that the Gospels have the avowedly religious purpose. Mark gives the limits of the Apostolic testimony which was the historical basis of the church (See Acts, 1:21,22). Luke writes that Theophilus may be certain of the facts in which he was orally instructed and which had led him to Christian experience. Matthew's gospel is an argument to prove that Jesus is the Messiah expected of the Jews, but Who is also the Saviour of the world. John tells us expressly (20:30,31) that he selected a few of the many things Jesus did to sustain the faith of disciples and lead to eternal life. Even in these books, then, we find that the Bible is not a text-book on history, or science, or geography, or biography, but a book of religious instruction. From any other point of view it is unsatisfactory. It lacks the historical interest and accuracy in detail.

Two questions suggested by the foregoing may occupy us in closing. The first is, What effect on our confidence in the Bible, as a guide in religion, must its historical inaccuracies produce? If we come to the Bible seeking instruction in the spiritual life, its usefulness for that is not impaired by what may be omitted or even incorrectly stated as to matters of history or science. The Bible is not an encyclopædia of universal information; it is only a guide to salvation. It is not necessary for one to know everything in order to give useful knowledge in some things. A man may be a safe guide in the Alps whose stories of Swiss history are largely incorrect. A man may be a good instructor in bricklaying who cannot spell correctly. It is inherent in our Quaker principle that a man may be a preacher of religious truth, led by the Spirit of God and not be learned in many other things. Many of our Quaker ministers have been the means of leading many people to God; have known and told correctly the truths of religion; who believed that potatoes would not grow unless planted in the "dark of the moon." Men trusted their knowledge of the growth of the soul in grace who distrusted their knowledge of how to grow potatoes. If the Bible were a text-book on history, historical errors would destroy its value, but they do not destroy its value as a book of religion; only errors as to religious truths could do that. The extracts from history and the narratives of the Bible are used only as means of enforcing religious lessons. They may do that correctly without being themselves historically accurate. For example, I once heard a minister preaching on the aid God gives His children. He wished to show how God comes to man's help in the hour of his need. In doing so he told the story of the crisis of the battle of Waterloo, when both Napoleon and Wellington were anxiously awaiting reinforcements. At last, he said, there appeared to the east a great cloud of dust, and each thought it was caused by the arrival of his own allies. But finally out of the dust emerged the Prussian uniforms; Blucher had come in the hour of need to aid Wellington, as he had promised to do. It is thus, the preacher said, man's extremity is God's time to succor his people. Now if he had been lecturing to a history class, and made that statement about the cloud of dust, it would have been a fatal error; for, as a matter of historic fact, it was the deep mud that delayed Blucher's arrival at Waterloo. But the preacher's error did not in the least spoil the illustration, for the point was that Blucher came in the hour of need—whether through dust or mud did not matter—just as God comes. So inaccuracies of detail, and even purely imaginative narratives, are used in the Bible as effective means of teaching religious truth. It is the historical student, not the religious reader, who feels the necessity of determining by critical processes whether the history is true.

The second question is, In what sense are these books inspired if the authors got their information from books and other human sources? Since the Biblical writers have nowhere taken the pains to describe the processes by which they were inspired, it is becoming that we do not be too dogmatic or confident in describing the ways of God. Two things are pretty evident, however. One is, that it is the religious truth that these books teach, not the facts they narrate, that was given them by inspiration of God's Spirit. The writers were prophets to whom God had given a revelation of Himself and His ways. The Hebrews put the books from Joshua to Kings in the book of the "Prophets" in their Bible. In the second place, these men were given the spiritual discernment to see below the surface of things. What to the uninspired observer was just the play of force, and wit, and chance, became to these men the doing of God, the outworking of His purpose, the result and illustrations of spiritual forces and truths. History can never again seem blind and Godless to one who has learned from these writers where to look for its inner meaning, whose spiritual eyes they have opened to see the working of the Lord.

BACK CREEK GRAVEYARD.

Old, uncared for, most forgotten,
Overgrown with weeds and grass,
Scarcely noticed, little thought of,
By the people as they pass,

Is an ancient Quaker graveyard,
With its stones in quaint array,
Sculptured o'er with hopes eternal,
Of the resurrection day.

Yet beneath this sod are resting
Folded in eternal sleep,
Men who toiled that we might prosper,
Men who sowed that we might reap.

Their glory not in martial deeds, Quiet, simple lives they led,
They built their faith on peaceful creeds,
Not on ruins of the dead.

THE QUAKER IDEA OF MUSIC IN ITS RELATION TO WORSHIP.

BY EDGAR L. REQUA.

Having now placed my subject before you, I shall briefly discuss it under two heads: First, music and worship. Second, the purpose of music.

First.—The literature the Friends have upon music is chiefly of a negative character. In 1885, a tract on singing and music was published in Philadelphia with the endorsement of that yearly meeting. It is against reading Scripture in meeting, and seems concerned for our ancient testimony against music; but its chief concern is against those abuses of music to which every true musician, let alone a Quaker, should say, Amen.

Many like to find refuge in Amos 6th. But the prophet here is not speaking against music, but the abuse of it, as I am. Instead of Israel praising God with voice and instrument, they took the same kind of instruments David made for the Temple and possibly the tunes, and used them at their sensual feasts. It is not to be supposed the prophet would pronounce a woe upon David's music, which had the sanction of God Himself. Compare Amos 6, 1-6, with II Chron. 29:25. The Temple had an orchestra of 4,000 instruments, 13 different kinds, and a choir of 285 trained voices. (See I Chron. 23:5 and 25:7.)

David had this in mind when he said, "Play skillfully with a loud noise, make a joyful noise unto the Lord." The Hebrews were the first people to use music to appeal to God and to praise Him with, and much of the good in church music to-day is traceable to David's time. It is a significant fact that some of the great musicians and singers of Europe are of Hebrew origin.

Some people, with anti-musical tendencies, have been very fond of quoting Barclay and other early Friends. George Fox sang in prison.*

The Quaker idea of music was that the soul would have such an in-flowing and out-flowing of the Divine Life that music, i. e., songs of praise, would spontaneously burst from the lips. This is a beautiful conception of music, but it is not the only one. Others beside Friends have attained to this kind of melody. Jonathan Edwards was often moved to sing when contemplating the Creator and His works. The midnight singing of Paul and Silas was undoubtedly of this character; David singing before the Ark; Israel and Miriam singing that triumphal ode recorded in Ex. 15; The Magnificat of Mary; the Benedictus of Zacharius; The Nunc Dimittis of Simeon, recorded in Luke—are all types of this kind of singing. It is the highest order of singing, and represents the Friends' ancient idea.

We must take into account the Hebrew Temple music, with which the Bible characters quoted were undoubtedly thoroughly familiar. Robert Barclay, in proposition XI on worship, confesses the singing of Psalms to be a part of worship when it arises from a true sense of God's love in the heart. This is in harmony with the axioms I have stated. Robert Barclay seems chiefly concerned with the misuse of music. I say amen to all he says, except to his statement on artificial music. He says, "As to artificial music, either by organs, other instruments, or by voice, we have neither precept nor example for it in the New Testament."

Jesus and His disciples sang a hymn at the close of the last Passover supper. (Matt. 26:30.) Paul and Silas sang till the prisoners heard them. (Acts 16:25.) The words translated, "sing" in both instances mean to sing a hymn with the voice. (Rom. 15:9.) I will confess and sing unto Thy name. (I Cor. 14:15.) I will sing with the spirit and understanding. (Jas. 5:3) Is any merry let him sing Psalms. The word "sing" here means to sing praise accompanied by an instrument. While in Eph. 5:9, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord. (Col. 3:16.) Sing with grace in your hearts. (Rev. 5:9.) They sang a new song. (Rev. 14:3.) They sing a new song before the throne. (Rev. 15:3.) They sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. The words translated "sing" mean to sing or chant an ode. Very few instruments were known in Paul's day. The organ and piano being comparatively modern.

Enough has been quoted from Scripture to prove that for once Robert Barclay is not exactly in the right. Since Robert Barclay confesses Psalm singing to be a part of God's worship, let us view music in its relation to worship.

The use of music in worship is twofold. First, to express the feelings of the heart. Second, to impress emotions or truths. Hence, in worship the office of music is that of praise. The music should be of a nature that praises and extols the Lord and sung unto the Lord. Such singing is worship. This does not conflict with Friends' theory of worship on the basis of silence or the leading of the Lord. Since, according to Barclay, "Worship consists in a holy dependence of the mind upon the Lord," what right have we to say the Lord does not lead to sing as well as to speak or to pray? Who shall say that the Lord may not lead one to announce a hymn, and if the singing be unto the Lord and in the will of the Lord, who shall say it is will-worship? There is a time for all things. The time for silence is at the beginning of a meeting for worship. The time for singing is when the heart is overflowing with love and praise. The habit of singing miscellaneous songs at the beginning of a meeting to keep people quiet while the stragglers are coming in, or to keep the clink of the pennies from being heard during the collection, or to fill in the time and prevent a few moments of what should be restful, worshipful silence—is a perversion and abuse of music and a disgrace to any church.

Since music is the art of expressing the emotions and feelings of the heart, the music of an epoch, nation, church or individual is a true index of the inner life. Whatever may be said in favor of the musical silence that fell upon Friends, and I have often thought it preferable to the musical riot of the last two decades, this fact is prominent: when we repressed song and were silent, we were stagnant; but when we began to sing we began to grow. On one hand we have a period of silence: no growth, no missions, no great activity. On the other hand, a period of singing, we grow, we plant missions in all parts of the world and we multiply at home. The more life we have, the more we will sing; and the more we sing, the more we will grow.

Time.—Uncertain; estimates differ from 1492 to 1200 B. C.

Place.—Generally thought to be "the land of Midian," in the southeastern part of the peninsula of Sinai. The burning bush was on Mount Sinai. Sinai and Horeb are used interchangeably. Strictly speaking, Sinai is, perhaps, a peak in the mountainous region called Horeb, just as Mount Blanc is one of the Alps.

Rulers—Ramses II was probably reigning when Moses fled from Egypt, and his son, Menephtah (or Merenptah), when Moses returned.

All that we know of the life of Moses in the land of Midian is contained in a few verses, Ex. 2: 15-22, which practically tell us nothing but that his conduct so pleased Reuel (Jethro) that he gave Moses his daughter, Zipporah, in marriage.

1. "Now Moses was keeping the flock." R. V. He had become a shepherd, and such occupation gave him ample time for reflection and thought. "Jethro." Called in the previous chapter (verse 18), Reuel, also called Raguel. It is possible that Jethro may refer to his office of priest. The references to Jethro rather imply that before he knew Moses he was not a worshipper of the true God, but became one. See Exodus 18: 1-12. "Back of the wilderness." R. V. Inland, away from the sea. The convent of Mount Sinai, where the Sinaitic MS. was discovered, is built on the traditional site of the incident described in the lesson.

2. "Angel of the Lord." A manifestation of Jehovah. "In a flame of fire." Fire is a symbol of the Divine presence. Compare Ex. 79: 18; I Kings 19: 12; Ezek. 1: 27, 28, etc. "The bush was not consumed." This was what attracted the attention of Moses. The mere fact of a bush on fire was doubtless no uncommon thing. The bush was a wild, thorny accacia, still common in the same district. It was called "shittim;" it grew sometimes to the height of 25 feet. The wood of this tree was used in the construction of the tabernacle. See Ex. 35: 24; 36: 31, etc. "Accacia wood." R. V.

3. The bush was not really burning—there was a shining as of a flame. "Turn aside." It was off the path he was treading.

4. The voice showed Moses that it was a supernatural appearance.

5. "Draw not nigh." He was not to approach too near. "Put off thy shoes" (sandals). "Holy ground." The Divine presence hallowed the place. It is still the custom in the East to put off the shoes in the mosques and even in houses on formal occasions.

6. "Thy father." Probably to be taken in a collective sense—thy fathers. See Acts 7: 32. "Hid his face." Just as Elijah did hundreds of years later in the same place (I Kings 19: 13). Each was overwhelmed by the sense of the Divine presence. See also Isa. 6: 1, 2-5; Deut. 18: 16.

7. "I have surely seen." The idea is, I have been seeing all the time.

8. "I am come down to help them." The Deity is spoken of in language applicable to man. Compare Gen. 11: 5. "Unto a good land," etc. Compare description in Deut. 8: 7-10. "The Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Amorite, and the Perizzite, and the Hivite, and the Jebusite." R. V. The first is often used to include all the others. "A land flowing with milk and honey" is a proverbial expression for a land that is altogether delightful. Palestine is an indefinite term as the boundaries varied greatly. What is generally understood by the name is the strip of land beginning at the end of the Arabian desert, and extending up the coast about 150 miles, and eastward to the Syrian desert, containing about 10,000 square miles, which is about the area of the State of Vermont. It is impossible even to estimate the population at this early period. Some think that all Syria was meant, which would be fully five times as great.

10. "I will send thee." The announcement comes to Moses with startling suddenness.

11. "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh?" Moses has learned many lessons in humility since he was in the position of the son of Pharaoh's daughter. On the one hand none could know better the power of Pharaoh, the hopelessness, from a human point of view, of an oppressed and downtrodden people attempting to rebel against the Egyptian Government. But on the other hand, who could be better fitted to lead the Hebrews than he who was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and thoroughly acquainted with all the methods and resources of Egypt?

10. "Certainly I will be with thee." An answer rather to the thought of Moses, than to his words. "Thou art not unfit, for I will be with thee," is the full meaning of the Divine answer. "This shall be the token." The "token" called for another exercise of faith. It was as much as to say, The time will come when thy brethren will worship Me here on this mountain, and thou wilt know that I have spoken the truth—that My plans are far-reaching.

13. Moses apparently gives up his humility, but a new difficulty looms up before him. Suppose I go to my brethren and announce my mission, will they believe me? What shall I call Thee? They, like the Egyptians, will wish to know Thy name. "I AM THAT I AM." "He is the eternal self-existent One." This name is said in the next verse to be equivalent to Jehovah; a name used before (Gen. 15:17), but not so interpreted. The name not only points to self-existence, but also implies unchangeableness. "The same yesterday, to-day and forever." To the Egyptian as to most, if not all other people, some graven image represented the deity they named and worshipped. To the Hebrew there was the name only. It is almost impossible to state accurately the meaning of the Hebrew words. Literally, it is "He who is." The Septuagint renders them, "THE BEING."

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "When God calls, He qualifies; and when He qualifies, He calls."
2. "God gives us almost every day new and sad experiences to educate and test us."

George Fox tells us in his journal of asking a Carolina Indian, "Whether or no, when he did lies, or do wrong to any one, whether there was not something in him that did reprove him for it?" And he said, "There was such a thing in him that did so reprove him, and he was ashamed when he had done wrong or spoken wrong." This, Fox offers as a proof of his claim made to a disputing doctor concerning the light and spirit of God, which is in every one. Certainly, not one of us is less aware of God's remembrance and nearness in times of our disobedience; but are we equally positive that we have had Him near in approval and encouragement?

It is one of the chief mercies that we enjoy, that the spirit is a reprover of unrighteousness, so that we can not go comfortably on the way to destruction, feeling no pang of separation from Him to whom we belong. If His only revelation were of this negative sort, however, we would know Him only by the barriers and prohibitions about our path; but He is also "a word behind thee saying, 'This is the way; walk ye in it.'" And in obedience there is fellowship.

The aid we breathe is within us and about us. Our life depends upon it yet we are, for the most part, unconscious of its presence. But its movement in the storm or the gentle breeze, or the lack of it in a stifling room, forces upon us a realization of its presence and usefulness. This typifies, in a feeble way, the intimate relations existing between us and "Him in Whom we 'live, and move, and have our being'"—Him Whose throne is in the heavens, but Who is manifest most truly and appreciably in the hearts of His disciples.

There are times of His manifestation, and we need to use opportunities often to reckon with Him as present—He who delivers in the moment of our weakness and rejoices in the time of our victory. We are in danger of taking Him too much as a matter of course, but we are also in danger of not taking Him at His word. It dishonors Him to ignore His assured presence; it dishonors Him to doubt when He has said, "I am with you." Says Frances Ridley Havergal, "Some of us think and say a good deal about the sense of His presence; praying for it, and not always seeming to receive what we ask; now on the heights, now in the depths about it. And all this April-like gleam and gloom, instead of steady summer glow, is because we are turning our attention upon the sense of His presence, instead of the changeless reality of it."

Jacob's wondering ejaculation, "Surely God is in this place, and I knew it not," has found its echo many times in many lives. But, alas, too many times God is with us and our eyes are not opened to see Him. How shall we know? "Commit thy way unto the Lord: trust also in Him." "To know Christ intimately, we must serve Him well."

DOINGS IN CUBA.

EXTRACTS FROM A LATE LETTER OF

JOSEPH M. PURDIE.

"February is a month of feasts and outings. The feasts of Carnival still have a hold on these people, and during the month there are balls, parades, and all the gaiety they can put into such a time. The minds and hearts of the masses are restless and on the lookout for something new and jolly. * * * We however cannot help but become sad at the growing indifference." * * *

"Although the month presents its difficulties, the Lord's work has continued and hearts have been blessed. * * * On the 7th, we received a new candidate for church membership. The members have begun to hold prayer-meetings among themselves; gathering in the home of one of the believers, they have a season of prayer, singing and Bible-reading. One of the most faithful members has taken upon herself the work of reading the Bible in different homes of poor and unlearned people. We are glad to see this new step and trust that you will remember these feeble efforts in your prayers." * * *

"For sometime we have felt that there is a need, in our department, of religious literature. Although we have some books and pamphlets in our library, still there is much room for books on Christian Evidence, Morals, and Biblical Exposition. One of our members has been reading the Spiritualists' books, and has been especially attracted by their exposition of texts in the New Testament. We hope to be able to put into his hands, and into the hands of "candidates" and other members, something which comes from holy, Christian hearts. We pray that the Lord may open some heart to send us either books (they must be in Spanish), or the money, especially for such books."

"It is always a cause for thanksgiving to go to Auras. Every time there is that interest and hope and trust manifested by the candidates, which make our hearts rejoice in their presence. On the 18th, Una and I went to this little town to hold a series of meetings. The attendance was good, except on Friday night. On Friday, most of the housekeepers iron their clothes, and since it was a moon-light night they would not take the risk of coming out into the moon-light (warm from their work). This superstition is so rooted in the hearts of these Cubans that sometimes one may see a person at night with an open umbrella to keep the silvery rays of the innocent moon from hurting him. Our efforts proved successful, however, and before leaving Auras, on the 23d, we were happy to take in six new candidates. There are now 28 candidates enrolled in Auras."

FROM A LETTER FROM C. C. HAWORTH, GIBARA, CUBA, FEBRUARY, 1907.

"The carnival time has just passed. This is always a time hard on the work of the church. * * The work at the out-stations, I feel, is in good condition. The two meetings at Potrerillo, this month, were the best that I have been permitted to attend there. The attendance was fair, and the interest good. I hope we may be able to do much more there. It is a town that needs it so much.

"The last time I went to Bocas (an out-station recently opened), I made some benches, with the help of a Cuban carpenter. We worked hard all one day, and when I asked him his price, he said he had not expected to charge me anything. I was surprised, but very grateful. He also said that he thought the people would be very glad to help in building a church by giving native material for the frame, and for me to let him know what was needed, and he would see what he could do. So Mr. Martin has made an estimate, and we are going to see what can be done, and if they will come up with the frame, we will see if there is not some friend or friends in the States that will give the $250 necessary to buy the lumber and roofing. The work will be largely done by the missionaries and by donations of work."

Open our eyes, merciful Father, that we may see the wide difference there is between what we are and what we ought to be. Startle us out of our spiritual slumbers.—William H. Furness.

Correspondence.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

During the persecution, under the Emperor Decian, in the third century, many of the Christians of the church at Carthage were sent into captivity amongst the barbarians. Cyprian, the good Bishop of Carthage, from his place of retirement, did not forget these faithful ones of the flock, but raised a large sum of money to be sent to the Numidian bishops for their ransom. In remitting this money, Cyprian wrote these touching words: "We considered that it was the temples of God which were taken captive, and that we ought not, through inactivity or neglect, to suffer them long to remain so. In our captive brethren we beheld Christ. . . . We give you the warmest thanks that you have been willing we should share in so great and necessary a work, and that you have offered us FRUITFUL FIELDS IN WHICH TO CAST THE SEEDS OF OUR HOPE, looking for an abundant harvest from this heavenly and saving act."

As the Numidian church thus gave the church at Carthage, itself scattered and hunted, the privilege of helping to succor the needy, so we of Lumbwa, among the barbarians of East Africa, offer you fruitful fields in which to cast the seeds of your hope. And we feel sure a harvest will result to the glory of God from such a planting at this time.

Our poor people here in Lumbwa have been suffering for some time from hunger, and it will be fully eight months, according to the statement of the collector to me the other day, before there can be any relief from their own crops. Even now the situation is so bad that they are beginning to sell their children for food. One has been offered to us, and the collector tells me that several have been offered around Kericho. A large number have come to us begging for work for their food. Up to this time we have not been able to take all who have applied, but some of the more needy cases, such as women with little children, are now at work digging for garden and cutting grass.

As the Lumbwa have not been all addicted to work, which is the sole reason for the present distress, since the land is fertile and last year there were 71 inches of rain, this is a providential opportunity to teach them the necessity and the dignity of it. And not only so, but it gives us a unique opportunity to bring them into sympathetic hearing of the Gospel. Our daily services are increasing in interest, as well as in numbers. It is particularly interesting and pathetic to watch the faces of the poor women as for the first time they hear the message of a great hope for their sex. Some sit in stolid indifference, as though the centuries of degradation had crushed out all hope or even desire. Others, as for instance, Arapcherikat's old, wrinkled, but jolly, good-natured mother, lean forward and, with lips apart and face alight, drink in the message like the thirsty souls they are. An encouraging result of our small relief work already is the request from some of our dependents that they be allowed to remain in the mission permanently. This is exactly what we want—as many native families as possible grouped about us, each with a house and a little plot of ground for their own needs.

The work, as a whole, is moving along satisfactorily. We have recently completed a brick storehouse and workshop, and are now at work on a dwelling, besides a number of permanent dwellings for our people.

Five of our young men, representing four different tribes, have acknowledged Christ. Three of these have gone back to their people, carrying with them, we trust, something of the new life in Christ. The other two are doing nicely. One of them has just been joined by his wife from far up in Usoga, and they are starting their new home joyously.

Those Friends who may be led to plant some seeds of hope in this fruitful field may send to Thomas C. Potts, treasurer, 316 North Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

WILLIS R. HOTCHKISS.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Charles F. Coffin, Chicago, was acceptably with Friends at Richmond, Va., on the 12th inst. He and his wife have been in the city about two weeks, the latter having been ill with pneumonia. Their many friends will be glad to know she is improving.

James Wood, wife and daughter have reached their home, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., after a three months' trip abroad. They spent about six weeks in Germany, and four in Great Britain, specially visiting London and York. James Wood's health was much improved by the trip.

J. Waldo Woody, a minister from Western Yearly Meeting, acceptably attended the meeting at Richmond, Va., during the past winter. He left a few days since to visit his parents in North Carolina, with a prospect of attending the seminary at Richmond again next winter.

Franklin and Mary M. Meredith expect to continue their pastoral work in the meeting at Traverse City, Mich. The meetings on First-day are well attended and manifest much interest. The evening Gospel services conducted by Mary M. Meredith have been the means of many conversions and renewals.

Whitelick Quarterly Meeting was held the 11th and 12th inst. Solomon Woodard, Superintendent of the Temperance Work of Western Yearly Meeting; S. Adelbert Wood, Knights-town; Charles A. Axton, Quaker, and others, were present. It was a time of unusual spiritual blessing.

Damascus Quarterly Meeting was held at Beloit, Ohio, the 11th and 12th inst. There was a good attendance. The spirit was good and unity prevailed. Ed. Mott was present throughout and gave clear, definite help. Walter R. Williams, the principal-elect of Damascus Academy for the ensuing year, gave a very helpful address on Seventh-day, at the Bible-school conference, and one on missions at the C. E. meeting, on Sabbath afternoon. This quarterly meeting is recovering from the "tongues' movement," and is doing good work.

J. Edgar Williams, having resigned his position as pastor in Greensboro Monthly Meeting of Friends, at Greensboro, N. C., to begin his new work as pastor in Seattle, Wash., left Greensboro with his family on the 3d inst. Previous to his departure, the Christian Endeavor tendered him and his family a farewell reception, in which the membership participated. Under his ministry, the meeting at Greensboro has grown. The young men and women have been interested, and the older members encouraged and strengthened.

The Friends' meeting at Portland, Ind., is improving. The pastor, Thos. E. Williams, by his untiring and consecrated efforts, has been able to hold an unusually large percentage of the converts of the revival of a year ago, beside bringing in others. He has won the hearts and confidence of the people of the city, as well as the meeting. The Christian Endeavor, numbering 60 in membership, is being reorganized, placing the young people in all the offices. A Bible class, comprising the leading professional and business men of the city, has been organized. The class is taking up the study of the Bible by entire books, and will fill a long-felt need in the city.

A communication from the Chicago West Side Monthly Meeting says: "We are all eagerly scanning a lot and building (frame), which have been offered to us at a reasonable price. We mostly agree upon the desirability of the position—Forty-fourth Avenue and Park Avenue—but are loth to undertake any bargain which we cannot carry out. If we had just about $2,500 more than we have at present available, we would have clear sailing ahead, and could purchase the lot, fix up the present building for present use, start a fund for the building which we need so much, and look up to God with courageous hearts and renewed convictions of successful operations. Some of our members have promised, willingly, to do their part and more, so we are in great hope about the ultimate conclusion."

The Friends' Institute, with rooms in connection with the meeting-house at 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, show some favorable items in their annual report for the year ending Fifth month 1st. During the past twelve months 66 different committees, representing the most diverse interests of members of the Society of Friends, have held meetings in the Institute; 401 of these committee meetings were held, as compared with 357 during the preceding year, with an attendance of 3,768 committeemen, an increase of 569 over the previous year. The number of visitors to the rooms of the Institute during last year was 12,890, as compared with 11,242 during the preceding year, an increase of 1,648. There were more visitors during the day time of last year and slightly fewer visitors in the evening, as compared with the preceding year.

The Sixth Annual Conference of Stella Quarterly Meeting was held at the Glade school-house, near Cleo, Okla., Fifth month 1st to 5th, inclusive. Each department of work in which the quarterly meeting is engaged was given one entire session. The needs and possibilities of each line of work were considered. The Conference was well attended, notwithstanding the very inclement weather, which prevailed almost the entire time, and the absence of any speakers outside the limits of the quarterly meeting. The temperance question, which is just now agitating the minds of the people of Oklahoma, was pretty thoroughly discussed, and the Conference declared itself emphatically in favor of State-wide prohibition. These annual gatherings of the workers of Stella Quarterly Meeting are looked forward to as times of real training and inspiration in the aggressive work of the church, and all who attend can but feel that the Lord is leading and blessing.

Several changes in the Faculty of Haverford College have been announced. The vacancy caused by the resignation of Ernest W. Brown, professor of mathematics, who will take a similar position at Yale, has been filled by the promotion of Dr. Legh W. Reid, while William H. Jackson, Cambridge, at present an instructor at Manchester, has been appointed an associate professor in the department of mathematics. Dr. Don C. Barrett has been promoted to a full professorship in economics. Prof. Wilfred P. Mustard has resigned his professorship of Latin and will accept a collegiate professorship in Johns Hopkins University. Richard M. Gummere, Haverford, '02, now in the graduate school at Harvard University has been appointed instructor of Latin. Thomas K. Brown, Haverford, '06, has been appointed instructor of German. The Clementine Cope Fellowship of $500, with the privilege to study a year at some American or foreign university, has been awarded to Roderick Scott, '06, of Yonkers, N. Y., while a teaching fellowship has been awarded to José Padin, '07, San Juan, Porto Rico.

Jennie Smith, who has done much successful work among railroad men, spoke to the student body at Earlham College the morning of the 2d inst.

Prof. Hodgkin, of the History Department, recently read a very interesting paper in chapel. He quoted at some length from advertisements of the Jamestown Exposition, which describe the "glorious" naval engagements to be seen there, and asked why our President, who hates "shows," should encourage such a one as this, especially when our country is supposed to stand foremost in the peace movement. He closed by describing in forceful irony the "glories" of the real engagements.

During the past year there have been 34 students in Earlham, who have expressed a willingness to preach. Frequently there are several students from the college holding services at different places on First-day.

A senior in the Department of Music, Mabel Stuart, gave an excellent graduating recital on the evening of the 7th inst.

Earlham's representative, Gustive Hoelscher, won first place in the State Prohibition contest, held at De Pauw, Fifth month 3d.

The thirty-sixth semi-annual meeting of the College Park Association of Friends was held at their meeting-house, on Morse Street, College Park, Cal., Fourth month, 27. The day was ideal, and early trains brought Friends from Berkeley, San Francisco and Palo Alto, and teams from nearer towns, until nearly every seat was occupied. Meeting for worship met at 10 o'clock. As usual, the meeting began with a period of silence. Hannah E. Bean spoke first, followed by Pliny E. Goddard from Paul's sermon to the Athenians: "The God whom ye ignorantly worship, Him, declare I, unto you." Dr. A. T. Murray, of Stanford University, preached a most interesting sermon upon "The Fellowship of Suffering." Elizabeth Shelley and Joel Bean offered prayer. Maria Freeman Gray, San Francisco, a member of Race Street Meeting, Philadelphia, and a prominent worker in the cause of peace, John and Nettie Riley, Walter Vail and others, until 10 had spoken in testimony and prayer. Among the speakers were six ministers. Beside others, all the "branches" of the Society of Friends were represented in the meeting. From 11:30 to 12 o'clock was a business session. Elizabeth Shelley, recording clerk, read the minutes of the last meeting, bringing the business of that session vividly before the meeting. Wilhelmina Bell Jones, corresponding secretary, reported letters written to scattered members, and read letters received in response with messages of love. Some of these from far countries, in their warmth of love and interest, seemed like old-fashioned yearly meeting epistles. The minute embodying the exercises of the last meeting and sent out was acknowledged as welcome and helpful by Friends in England. The usual reports of the Indian, Japanese, and Missionary Committees were presented. A Sabbath-school from the country sent in $5.00 for the Ramallah School.

From 12 to 1.15 was given to lunch and social mingling. It was said 50 or more sat down to lunch in the dining-room annex, or outside under the trees. In the afternoon, this program was followed:

1st.—After a brief pause, all arose and repeated, in concert, the First Psalm.

2nd.—Isaac Penington, the Mystic.....By Hannah E. Bean

3d.—Recitation By Abby Roberts

4th.—Edward Burrough, the Slum Worker..By George N. Jones

5th.—The Work of the International Reform Bureau.....

Elizabeth H. Shelley.

6th.—Recitation....."What Shall We Do To-day"
By Sarah Walton.

The recitations were beautifully rendered, and the papers were well prepared and exceedingly interesting, and each elicited a lively discussion, in which more than a dozen took part. Several from Berkeley and San Francisco remained over for meeting on First-day, in which Pliny Goddard and Maria Freeman Gray, with others, had acceptable service in ministry. All felt that the meeting was one of favor and helpfulness.

The Second Joint Ministerial Association of Indiana and Western Yearly Meeting of Friends met in Greenfield, Ind., Fifth month 13, 1907.

The program throughout touched on large, practical plans of evangelistic and constructive church work.

The subjects presented and discussed were as follows:

"The Message and Methods," Oliver M. Fraser; "Relation to the General Work of the Church," Thomas C. Brown; "Earlham's Contribution to the Working Forces of the Church"—a statistical sketch, Murray S. Kenworthy; "Music in Worship," a symposium; "The Tests of Spiritual Guidance," Sylvester Newlin; The Quaker Pastorale: "Development of the Pastoral System Among Friends," Richard Haworth; "The Problem of a Consistent Quaker Pastorale," Elbert Russell; "Friends' Ministers and Missions," Sylvester Jones.

Some of the special thoughts impressed upon the Conference under these various subjects were, that the message of evangelism is the message of Jesus Christ, who saves man from littleness of soul, and from all sin, and brings him into communion with his Creator. No church can be in a normal state without the spirit of evangelism.

Interesting statistics were presented, showing the far-reaching influence of our educational institutions. Our denominational schools are to prepare for service to the church.

Music, it was said, is a companion to worship and should be of the highest type, appealing to the soul of man. We should seek the best in music.

The keynote of the Conference was touched in a most impressive message on "The Tests of Spiritual Guidance. Under this message and the power of the Spirit, which accompanied it, the Conference was brought under a feeling of holy silence, followed by prayer and praise.

It was shown that the "Development of the Pastoral System Among Friends" came as a result of a great revival, which brought thousands into our ranks, and many believed pastors were necessary, especially in newer meetings; but in order that the Quaker Pastorale be consistent with our ideas of the ministry, and with our church organization, the pastor should not pose as a worshipper for the congregation, but there must still be ample opportunity given for the exercise and development of individual gifts, all standing in equality before God.

The paramount work of the church, that of the evangelization of the world, was brought before the conference in its closing session. It was stated that if the world is evangelized, the church must do it. The church must be a missionary force, or it will die.

The Conference was characterized by a sweet spirit of unity and harmony, and the practical subjects before the Conference could not fail to be helpful and inspiring to those present, and, we believe, enable them to do more efficient work. About 75 ministers were present.

The people of Greenfield did themselves credit in the splendid way in which they entertained the Conference, and the hospitality shown, not only by Friends, but by other churches, in opening their doors to Friends.

Pastors from several of the city churches were welcomed and given the privileges of the Conference.

The Conference closed with a sense of the blessedness of "the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love."

"Ad majorem Dei gloriam."

Beneath the shadow of the Olive Tree
Thy last, long home was found;
From earthly burthens and desires set free
They laid thee in the ground.

Where Virgil's ashes rest by Naples' Bay,
The land which Paul had trod,
Where saints and martyrs of the olden day
Had found the peace of God:

Where Horace sang his own immortal Ode,
Where Belisarius reigned,
On that sad shore where Cæsar found abode,
By guilt and license stained:

Where Capri's waters rest the weary eye,
Thy spirit took its flight,
And thro' the dimness of an earthly sky
Sprang upward to the Light.

O, brother, as we view thy record clear,
A life so full and pure,
The time and distance only bring thee near
And make our love secure.

Thy ear was open to the widow's cry,
To hear the wanderer's moan;
Thy heart responded to the orphan's sigh,
And made its wants thine own.

Within thy soul there seemed to be no room
For an ignoble guest;
An inward grace revealed a heavenly bloom
Through windows in thy breast.

Across the broad expanse of Southern wave
Our spirits seem to tread,
We long to stand beside thy quiet grave
With bowed and reverent head.

God of our lives! Thy Hand the garden made Wherein this plant has grown;
Thy loving care provided sun and shade,
For that Thy Hand had sown.

Make us, Thy children, bud and blossom yield,
Pluck all the tares away,
And only fruit remain upon the field
Until the Harvest Day.

It is hoped that all who see this who have clothing, shoes, etc., to contribute, will send them to Friends' Institute, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, plainly marked "For Christiansburg," not later than the 29th. A special request comes for books for the children to read. They have made good use of those already in their library.

FEEDING FOR HEALTH

DIRECTIONS BY A FOOD EXPERT.

A complete change in food makes a complete change in the body. Therefore, if you are ailing in any way, the surest road back to health is to change your diet. Try the following breakfast for ten days and mark the result.

Two soft-boiled eggs, (If you have a weak stomach, boil the eggs as follows: put two eggs into a pint tin-cup of boiling water, cover and set off the stove. Take out in nine minutes; the whites will be the consistency of cream and partly digested. Don't change the directions in any particular.) some fruit, cooked or raw, cooked preferred, a slice of toast, a little butter, four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with some cream, a cup of properly boiled Postum Food Coffee.

The Grape-Nuts breakfast food is fully and scientifically cooked at the factory and both that and the Postum have the diastase (that means digests the starchy part) developed in the manufacture. Both the food and the coffee, therefore, are pre-digested and assist, in a natural way, to digest the balance of the food. Lunch at noon the same.

For dinner in the evening use meat and one or two vegetables. Leave out the fancy desserts. Never over-eat. Better a little less than too much.

If you can use health as a means to gain success in business or in a profession, it is well worth the time and attention required to arrange your diet to accomplish the result. Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

THE PLEASURES OF "IFFING."

"If" this or that were thus and so,
Oh, wouldn't it be clever!
But "ifs," alas! won't make it so
Though we should "if" forever.
Yet, while "ifs" cannot help a mite,
We'd all be less contented
And life would hold far less delight
If "iffing" were prevented.

OPTIMISM

"My optimism does not rest on the absence of evil. I can say with conviction that the struggle which evil necessitates is one of the greatest blessings. It teaches us that although the world is full of suffering, it is full also of the overcoming of it. My optimism rests on a glad belief in the preponderance of good and a willing effort always to co-operate with the good, that it may prevail. I try to increase the power God has given me to see the best in everything and every one, and make that Best a part of my life. To what is good I open the doors of my being, and jealously shut them against what is bad."—Helen Keller.

Events and Comments.

The farmers' union of Georgia, said to have a membership of 80,000, has gone on record as being strongly opposed to bringing foreign immigrants into the South. A largely attended convention in Atlanta is reported to have unanimously adopted a resolution condemning the immigration movement, and asking the Legislature to make no appropriation to bring foreigners into Georgia.

The thirteenth annual session of the Lake Mohonk International Arbitration Conference met last week, and Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, was chosen president; Clinton R. Woodruff, of Philadelphia, secretary; H. C. Phillips, of Mohonk Lake, N. Y., permanent corresponding secretary, and Alexander C. Wood, Camden, N. J., treasurer.

Several thousand men out of the fifty thousand now working on the New York Central Railroad will lose their employment as the result of a recent order to reduce pay-rolls Sixth month. Railroad officials point to the present high wage scale for railroad labor as the reason for retrenchment; while the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad has discontinued the sale of commutation tickets as a result of the recent two-cent fare legislation in Pennsylvania.

The last National Convention of the Anti-Saloon League decided to ask the Christian churches of the United States to set aside Sixth month 30th, the First-day preceding the "Fourth of July," as "Stainless Flag Day," at which time pastors and other speakers are asked to preach a sermon, or give talks, on behalf of Purity and Temperance. The Anti-Saloon League has issued a pamphlet giving an address of Erwin S. Chapman on "The Stainless Flag," which is very suggestive and instructive.

The Pennsylvania Railroad is to construct a new bridge across East River, New York. It will be the longest and heaviest steel bridge in the world. Eighty thousand tons of steel are to be used in its construction and it will carry four railroad tracks embedded in stone ballast, so as to render the structure noiseless. When the undertaking is completed, New York will enjoy, for the first time, a through all-rail route between New England and the South and West, dispensing with the necessity for ferrying trains from the Bronx to Jersey City.

We reprint the second stanza of the poem, "Vanquished, But Not Subdued," which appeared, since the printers made a mistake in the last line destroying the meaning of the whole. The word, "Loves," appeared where it should have been "Lares." The stanza should read:

One day, a boy still, sobs my heart-strings rending,
 Sad, yet still confident, I raised my eyes,
 And, toward a holy love my gaze directing,
 The Lares' adverse fate I openly defied.

The new divorce law of New Jersey follows, to some extent, the recommendations of the late Divorce Congress, although many features of the recommendations are ignored. It provides that two years permanent residence in the State is necessary before divorce proceedings can be instituted. This is intended to keep citizens of other States from taking up temporary residence in order to gain advantage of some particular feature of the law. It also provides that marriages are not binding between persons where the wife is under sixteen years of age, and the husband eighteen years, unless the parties subscribed to it after they have come to the years named. This provision is intended to prevent child marriages.

The following comment appeared in the Springfield Republican:

"In the statement which Abraham Ruef, the San Francisco boss, made after pleading guilty in court, it was notable that he vowed not to injure, by any subsequent confession, those who had practiced bribery against their will. He had apparently been deeply impressed by experience with the fact, as he saw it, that the building up of a great system of graft literally forced some men, thoroughly disposed to be honest, into dishonest ways, such as employing bribery to secure franchises which they would have sought in the open had they not known that bribes were expected by the officials in power. There is undoubtedly a degree of truth in this view of the matter, and it is one of the most melancholy phases of graft, though such bribe-givers cannot, and should not, be acquitted because of original good intentions; with good intentions hell is said to be paved."

In a dispatch from Rome the correspondent of the Times (London) says, that the Pope has issued a decree intrusting the entire revision of the Vulgate to the Benedictine Order,—this being an outcome of the Biblical Commission appointed toward the end of the Pontificate of Leo the 13th. Probably no book has exercised a more powerful influence in moulding the faith, morals, thought, and traditions of the literature of western Europe and the Americas than the Latin version of the Scriptures; and the proposed revision is an important step. It is also a recognition of the better rendering of portions of the Scripture text due to the faithful labors of modern scholars.

THE EFFECT OF COFFEE ON HIGHLY ORGANIZED PEOPLE.

"I have been a coffee user for years, and about two years ago got into a very serious condition of dyspepsia and indigestion. It seemed to me I would fly to pieces. I was so nervous that at the least noise I was distressed, and many times could not straighten myself up because of the pain.

"My physician told me I must not eat any heavy or strong food and ordered a diet, giving me some medicine. I followed directions carefully, but kept on using coffee and did not get any better. Last winter my husband, who was away on business, had Postum Food Coffee served to him in the family where he boarded.

"He liked it so well that when he came home he brought some with him. We began using it and I found it most excellent. While I drank it my stomach never bothered me in the least, and I got over my nervous troubles. When the Postum was all gone we returned to coffee, then my stomach began to hurt me as before, and the nervous conditions came on again.

"That showed me exactly what was the cause of the whole trouble, so I quit drinking coffee altogether and kept on using Postum. The old troubles left again and I have never had any trouble since." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

THE CHURCH AND THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

We have followed with much interest the intense discussion of the temperance question in the Presbyterian General Assembly, at Columbus. The newspaper reports say that this debate on the temperance issue has been the hottest debate which has taken place in the Presbyterian General Assembly for many years. It is especially interesting to Friends, because the debate arose over the attempt of the Presbyterian Permanent Committee on Temperance to hold a Temperance Conference, composed of delegates from all the churches, and so promote church federation in dealing with the saloon.

There was a large number of delegates who were determined to have the Anti-Saloon League endorsed and made the main organ through which the church should work for checking and destroying the liquor traffic. There was another section of the delegates eager to have the reform activities of the church carried on within the church, and through distinct church-machinery. There were some who feared that the Committee on Temperance had taken courses which tended to identify the church too much with party politics; others contended that it must be the policy of the Presbyterian church to avoid official representation in non-ecclesiastical organizations.

The whole discussion, intense and hot as it was, is to our minds much to be regretted. It was the fear of heat and bitterness that kept the churches from accepting the call of the Five Years' Meeting to a general conference in Washington last autumn. It has become almost a scandal that temperance cannot be discussed by Christian bodies without white heat and passion. In some of our yearly meetings there is a dread of the temperance meeting, for the kettle is quite certain to boil over and leave a scalding feeling that lasts through the year. This dread is common in many other churches, and the fierceness of the internal discussion over "methods" has quite often far surpassed the fierceness of the attack on the saloon itself! This is surely the fighting of the awkward squad, where the most serious danger consists in being attacked by a wing of the squad itself.

The time has surely come for wiser and saner counsels. A Christian church is an organization for the promotion of the Gospel of Christ, for carrying the saving life of Christ into the lives of men, for making love and goodness prevail in individuals and in society. Its work of reform, as well as all its other kinds of activity, is to be done in the spirit of the Master, that is to say, in a spirit of mutual condescension and co-operation. The great questions of reform—questions which affect the appetite and manner of life of the rank and file of the country—are terribly complex questions. They are not to be settled by white-hot passion and fierce debate. What we need, in place of these passionate temperance debates, which drive us into opposite camps, are solid conferences, in which we really study the saloon and its work, and learn ways of massing the entire influence and power of the church against its havoc. Instead of using our ingenuity to discover how to force some issue that will separate the church into groups, why not use a little wisdom to find out how the moral power of God-fearing, Christ-loving people can be unified and pointed like an irresistible shaft against the evil itself? There are unifying ideas and principles, there are common interests and desires, there are facts and conclusions upon which all intelligent men agree. Let us think for a while on these things and see if we cannot make toward the time when the scandal of bitterness in Christian bodies over the temperance issue shall cease, and when the common enemy shall be the one point of attack.

IN ORDER TO SUCCEED.

The late dictator of San Francisco, who is on trial, charged with many crimes, has made a partial confession. We cannot vouch for the truth of his statements in detail, but the general outline of his story must be true, else it would not have been offered in court:

"I have been guilty of conniving at the corruption of municipal officials by corporations. . . .

"I wanted to break away from Schmitz before his re-election a year ago last November, and said to him: 'I am sick of the whole thing and I want to get out. I can't stand for all these labor union bums you have gathered around you and will appoint. They would eat the paint off a house.' In answer, the Mayor begged me to stay with him, and put up the argument that those fellows must be allowed their share or we could never hold the machine together. There was all too much truth in that.

"I stayed with Schmitz and I stayed with the machine that I at great labor and pains had built up. . . .

"I found, in short, that to hold this machine together I had to permit and connive at corruption. In the state of affairs existing, it was necessary." . . .

This unhappy political leader admits "conniving at the corruption of municipal officials," and hints at deeper crimes, but he offers this plea: "I had to do it in order to succeed." And this is the plea of thousands all over our land, who are high in political and industrial circles. They tell us that compromise is necessary for success, and there is too much truth in the statement if success is measured by votes and dollars. The same might be said concerning many men in clerical positions, although the rule here seems the reverse. In a recent Bible class, composed of laborers and professional men, the question whether honesty pays financially, was the topic for discussion, and the universal conviction was that, with few exceptions outside of clerical positions, strict honesty does not pay. There are many exceptions to the rule no doubt, but everywhere the cry is heard, "Competition is so sharp, we must compromise, or fail."

The days for burning Christians at the stake, or throwing them to beasts, are past; but if we are to accept the situation reflected in Ruef's confession, the occasions for moral heroism are not so remote. Many a man enters business, or politics, with high ideals and pure motives only to find that he is doomed to stay at the bottom of the ladder or fall in with the "gang." This does not mean much at first, because the full significance of his course is not often realized until he is well on the way. Then when he does awake, not only his wages, but old associations, the humiliation of defeat, and other forces hinder his withdrawal. To stay means further compromise, and every step makes reform more difficult. Then, again, the sharp competition of which the "captains of industry" complain affects the rank and file in another way. Many men have families depending upon them, and the struggle for respectable existence is not easy. Business retrenchment, or political capitulation, not only brings humiliation to those in the home, but often actual want. These are some of the conditions which the confession reveals, and they are conditions which this generation of Christians must meet.

The issue depends upon the standard used for measuring success. It is well to know at the beginning of life that we must choose between God and Mammon. Christianity as it should be lived, does not square with prevailing business methods. It does not mean that a measure of success cannot be attained in a strictly honest way; but it does mean that men can often get money easier and more of it, dishonestly, than they can honestly. We must put integrity above gold, if we would build on something better than sand.

Another lesson which this sad spectacle would teach is expressed in a trite old Quaker phrase, "Keep close to your guide," or to translate it into the language of every-day life, do right as soon as you discover it is right, and quit sinning as soon as you know it is wrong. We all make mistakes, and go astray, but there is no better time to mend than the first day we find it out.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

In response to our request, Isaac Sharpless has written the following letter, calling the attention of our readers to the coming summer-school to be held at Bryn Mawr. We hope many will avail themselves of the privilege of this occasion:

"The Friends' Summer-School of Religious History has had two sessions, one in 1900 and one in 1904, at Haverford College. This year Bryn Mawr College kindly offered its extensive buildings and grounds for the use of the school, and the offer has been accepted. The sessions of the school will begin on Sixth-month 14th, and continue through the following week. Printed schedules giving all the necessary information will be forwarded on application to the secretary, Dr. George A. Barton, Bryn Mawr, Pa.

"These meetings offer an excellent opportunity for Friends in different sections to become acquainted, not only with one another, but with many of the problems which now interest Christian scholars. Not the least important of the exercises will be a series of conferences in which the vital questions which most intimately concern the present conditions of the Society of Friends will be freely discussed.

"It is desired that the school may have an influence distinctly spiritual and constructive, and that it will have not only an educative but a unifying effect upon the Friends who attend. Previous sessions of the school have had a profound influence in molding friendly thought and creating additional incentives for the support of the good cause in which we should all be interested, and the committee hopes that the present occasion will be still more helpful.

"We should be glad to have the attendance of Friends of all sections and shades of belief.

"ISAAC SHARPLESS,
"Chairman of Committee."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.
ON THE YANGTSE RIVER.

BY ROBERT L. SIMKIN.

We made excellent time at this rapid, yet it was three and one-quarter hours from the time we disembarked before we could get back on the boat to the good dinner which awaited us. We wondered if it was with a feeling of thankfulness that the old pilot beat his gong that night, and went through his worship before the little god over the doorway.

Sunday we spent tied up to the north bank under a row of rude shanties on the hillside. Gathering many of the trackers about us on shore, some hymns were sung and Mr. Toyne preached, also Mr. Wigham's Chinese cook, who is a Christian. There was a grand breeze blowing, and it was a great temptation to the captains to go on, especially as boat after boat passed us, their crews evidently wondering why we were not traveling. However, it was in our agreement to stop Sundays and pay the captains for the extra rice, so they could say nothing. It was noticeable that during each week we would pass nearly every boat which we had seen going by us the previous Sunday. The men enjoyed the day's rest and used the time for washing and mending their clothes and for combing the tangles out of their queues. In some cases they gambled on Sunday, but this was not extensive.

We hoped to reach Kwei Fu for Chinese New Year, but had we gone on we should have arrived too late for the crew to purchase their pork and wine for the celebration. Therefore, when we reached Wushed Wushan Hsien the captains ordered the boats to moor, and we counted out the fifty cash (about three cents) per man, which we had agreed to give them for the celebration. As there was no hope that the boats would move on again that day, we divided into two parties and went into the city to sell some Christian tracts. We found the inhabitants very busy pasting up new placards all over the town. On nearly every doorway are pasted two pictures of fierce men with drawn swords, which are supposed to scare away the demons from that home. At the top and sides of each doorway are bright red strips of paper written over with wise sayings and complimentary sentences. One fellow was pasting on the wall opposite his own doorway one of these, which read, "If you go in and out of my place I have the power to produce luck." As we walked along the street an immense crowd followed us, and we had no difficulty in disposing of all the tracts we had brought. One man asked me to read the characters of the title of the one he had bought. Being afraid that he would despise me as an illiterate man because I could not read it, I took out a little English book and asked him to read. The whole crowd saw the point and laughed heartily when he shook his head.

Just to illustrate the tremendous movement toward modern methods of educating: In this little city a government boarding-school was built two years ago, in which the boys are taught geography, astronomy, mathematics, and the Japanese language. The teacher is Japanese, and the students are required to worship and burn incense before the tablet of Confucius, which occupies a central place in the building. Such non-Christian schools are being established all over the empire. Certainly one of the greatest needs in China to-day is to give these young men an education which shall be Christian. Adjoining this school we visited two temples containing shrines, horrible representations of warriors, and a still more disgusting image of Buddha. A decrepit old priest was mumbling over some prayers until Mr. Toyne gave him a tract, when he sat down and read it eagerly. The people were very friendly, and the boys especially seemed highly delighted when I gave them the Chinese words for "eye," "ear," and "nose." Almost as long as they could see us they stood on the bank laughing and calling out, "Yen-jin," "Erdo," "Bee-dze." Nearly every Chinese crowd I have seen has a keen sense of humor and will laugh at the slightest provocation. In these small, interior cities, where foreigners are seldom seen, we seem to them a huge joke, our speech, our looks, and our dress all interesting them immensely.

That night many of the crew were gambling until very late. Gambling is a fearfully common vice among the Chinese. Sometimes they use bamboo sticks marked as dominoes, which they hold in their hands like a pack of cards. Dice are frequently used, and they have a deep bamboo tube in which they shake together a lot of spade-like sticks. The gambler chooses one or more of these sticks, draws them out of the tube, and reads the numbers on the blades at the bottom. Another method is to spin two cash on a smooth table and suddenly invert a bowl over them. Each man in the circle then makes his bet on "heads or tails," laying out any number of cash he chooses. The bowl is then removed, the two coins are inspected, and the chief gambler then makes his reckoning accordingly with every man in the circle, either giving or receiving from each the amount of his bet.

From what I can see, wine drinking is not so common as in America. Here and there one meets a man whose flushed face and irritable disposition betoken a frequent indulgence, but I have not seen a man really drunk. It may be that they drink mostly at home, but as to that I cannot say. Opium smoking, however, is coming to be one of the great curses of China. We had three opium sots on our boat, and two of the men in the uban used the drug. At night always, and sometimes three times a day, they would lie on the floor smoking the vile stuff, the fumes of which would penetrate into every room on the boat. At Kwei Fu a young telegraph clerk heard in some way that I had medicine for breaking off the habit, so he came to get some, ostensibly for a friend of his, but really for himself, for he was ashamed to acknowledge the habit. He brought as a present six pumelous. Of course, I could do nothing for the poor fellow further than to turn him over to Mr. Platt, the missionary there, who told him it was of no use to take medicine unless he could put himself under treatment for a month in a hospital at Wan Hsien. In Kwei Fu alone there are 600 opium dens, but the tax on them has recently been tremendously increased.

About 1 P. M. of the Chinese New Year (February 13th), our men having ended the firing of crackers and the burning of cash paper, candles and incense, we started on under a good breeze, Li's boat leading for the first time during the journey. About the middle of the afternoon we were sailing up a small rapid when something went wrong, for we were seized and carried back down stream in a hurry. Our men then tried the north bank, sailing up well in a backwash. Just as the boat rounded the point into the current the heavy sail swung over to the other side and the boat tipped fearfully, sliding a lot of things off the table. To add to the confusion, our charcoal brazier tipped over, scattering the live coals over the floor of the dining room. Mrs. Simkin and I rushed frantically into the kitchen, calling "Shui," "Shui" (pronounce "shway"). The old cook evidently thought we were crazy, for he stood there as if stupefied until we seized a pail of water and rushed back into the dining room. The brazier was finally righted, and the coals gathered up on a piece of tin and restored to their proper place without the use of our "shui," so no damage was done, save that we had some burnt marks on the floor for the rest of the journey.

Just below Kwei Fu is the Windbox Gorge, through which the wind frequently sweeps with such force that boats are sometimes delayed for days. We had a favoring breeze and passed through in less than two hours. Near the upper entrance to the gorge we passed a village from which a great volume of steam was rising, caused by the evaporation of salt. Most of the salt in China is of very poor quality and very expensive, as the Government has a sort of monopoly on the industry.

Knowing that it was winter when we came up, you may picture, as I did, that when we walked it would be through mud and light melting snows. On the contrary, we had not a bit of snow and only part of a day's rain during the entire trip. Ordinarily the sand was quite dry, and on several days when the sun shone I did not dare venture any great distance without my sun helmet. The nights were cool, sometimes requiring an overcoat, but we did not see any frost, except at the tops of the mountains, which were frequently white with snow. All the way, especially during the last half of the trip, the hillsides were green with wheat, vegetables, beans, peas, and the poppy. You have never seen economy in farming if you have not been in China. The hills are terraced from top to bottom and every inch is utilized. Wherever a hill of wheat can possibly stick it is planted, and frequently where a thin layer of sandy earth has been deposited on the rocks near the river, this is scraped together into little mounds to afford space for a few hills of peas.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

[Our friend, J. Bewley Beale, Dublin, has sent us the following notes on Dublin Yearly Meeting, to which we add the report in the London Friend on the appointment of Fraternal Delegates to the Five Years' Meeting.—Ed.]:

Much prayer had been offered by many Friends in different places, up and down, for a special blessing on our yearly meeting. Many grateful acknowledgments were made that these petitions were abundantly answered. The Lord's messengers from America and England were much used by Him to this end. At the meeting on Ministry and Oversight we had the company of William C. Allen, Philadelphia, and Howard Nicholson and his wife, also Dr. Charles G. Clarke, London. Besides these and other English Friends, we were favored at the yearly meeting proper with the company of Arthur B. and Edna H. Chilson, Kansas Yearly Meeting, on their way to Friends' Industrial Mission, East Africa.

The various meetings in and around Dublin on First-day were well attended, and the Gospel fully preached, and social meetings, at which our missionaries home on furlough were present, profitably filled up the evening.

At our first sitting very great interest was aroused in the hopeful and encouraging condition of things as set forth in many of the epistles received from America. For the third time, a summary of these epistles was prepared, embracing all their salient points. Printed copies of this summary were circulated through the meeting, so that while it was being read Friends could note any points to refer to afterward. These copies seem to have been all carried away by Friends for future reading. Letters from Australia and New Zealand, also from most of our mission stations abroad, brought the circumstances of our friends in these various places vividly before us, and evoked prayerful sympathy on their behalf.

The cordial invitation received last year from America to this yearly meeting to appoint "fraternal delegates" to attend the five years' meeting at Richmond, Ind., was again considered, and, after very general expression of unity, it was accepted, and five Friends were selected for this purpose. They were left at liberty to attend any other service to which they might feel called.

The consideration of the state of our Society in this land occupied two sittings. Although the statistical returns do not indicate any increase in numbers, yet there was a decided evidence of increase of interest in the work of the church, and of the growth in the Christian life. Several gatherings took place of younger Friends, and an Association has recently been formed by them, which is working vigorously for the promotion of earnest Christian life amongst its members. Arising out of the above consideration, a committee was appointed to visit our meetings, and, where thought needful, the schools and families of Friends.

The Conference on Foreign Missions, or, more correctly, the Annual Meeting of the Irish Auxiliary of the F. F. M. A., is one of the great points of interest to many Friends attending the yearly meeting. This year it was a very large and enthusiastic meeting. The presence of missionaries from Madagascar and Ceylon, besides some members of the London Board, contributed largely to this result. The reports given, both at this and the Home Mission Conference, on the following evening, of good work accomplished, was cause for much thanksgiving and praise. At both meetings the evidence of progress was very marked, and at the same time the duty resting upon us to go forward with fresh zeal was brought home to many.

The subject of Education claimed attention, as usual, and the reports from our schools all indicated a fairly healthy condition, and some increase in the number of pupils.
